Player Profiles (Alphabetical by Position)

Quarterbacks

Derek Anderson, ARI

Bye: 6

Derek Anderson has landed with the Cardinals after the Browns released him this offseason, and it's there where he'll have the chance to compete for the starting quarterback job vs. Matt Leinart. Anderson has been abysmal since his incredible 2007 campaign, posting his worst stats in 2009 when he completed just 44.5 percent of his passes (81 of 182 passing) for 888 yards, three touchdowns, three fumbles lost and 10 interceptions. But if he can earn the starting job with the Cardinals and get the chance to throw regularly to Larry Fitzgerald and Steve Breaston, the potential would be there for him to top 3,500 yards passing with close to 20 touchdowns. He's worth a late-round pick in drafts as it stands now, but if he's officially named the Cardinals starting quarterback this summer he'll vault into the middle-to-late rounds as a potential-laden No. 2 QB.

Sam Bradford, STL

Bye: 9

Sam Bradford is expected to contend for the Rams' starting QB job after being selected No. 1 overall by the team in April's draft. He finished as Oklahoma's all-time leader with passed for 8,403 yards and 88 touchdowns in two-plus seasons with his college career ending after a pair of shoulder injuries that have since checked out. Bradford's arm is solid, his accuracy is excellent and he's got a good head for the game. He should be a solid fit for the Rams' West Coast offense. One problem: His receiving corps is very weak with Donnie Avery his most appealing option, although the Rams added rookie Mardy Gilyard in Round 4 from Cincinnati. Bradford is no better than a late-round pick in the deepest of seasonal drafts, but he's worth a mid-round choice in dynasty/keeper leagues and is a no-brainer first-round pick in rookie-only drafts.

Tom Brady, NE

Bye: 5

Tom Brady came back big in 2009 after missing nearly all of the 2008 season with a torn ACL. He played like a No. 1 Fantasy QB again, completing 371 of 565 passes (65.7 comp. pct.) for 4,398 yards (7.78 yards/att.), 28 touchdowns and 13 interceptions and adding 44 rushing yards and a touchdown with two fumbles lost. While Brady was back as a standout Fantasy option, he failed to match the lofty stats he posted in his record-breaking season in 2007 (4,806 passing yards, 50 touchdowns and eight interceptions). He will struggle to reach that plateau again, especially this season with Wes Welker coming into the year dealing with a torn knee ligament. Welker should return early in the season, and when he does Brady will take off. He remains a No. 1 Fantasy option worth a pick at the end of Round 2 or beginning of Round 3 in all leagues, and he's entering a contract year which can only help motivate him. Randy Moss is still on the roster, and Julian Edelman should do well to replace Welker along with any other options the team brings on, which include veteran Torry Holt and rookie tight ends Rob Gronkowski and Aaron Hernandez. If second-year receiver Brandon Tate, a sleeper of ours, can emerge as a viable target, Brady will again have a solid receiving corps. You can expect about 4,300 passing yards, 28 touchdowns and 13 interceptions again in 2010.

Drew Brees, NO

Bye: 10

Drew Brees should continue to be a slam-dunk for Fantasy owners in 2010. The Super Bowl XLIV MVP put up huge numbers for the third straight season in New Orleans, completing an incredible 70.6 percent of his regular-season passes (363 of 514) for 4,388 yards, 34 touchdowns and 11 interceptions. Brees also amassed 33 rush yards and two rushing touchdowns along the way. His postseason was equally impressive – not only did Brees continue to throw at a 70.6 percent clip, but he put up eight touchdowns and didn't throw a single interception in three playoff games. Moreover, in his 15 regular-season games (he rested Week 17) and three postseason games Brees topped 250 yards 12 times, had at least two touchdowns in 13 games and didn't provide either stat in just two games (at Buffalo and vs. the New York Jets). Want a safe Fantasy pick? Brees is among the best in the game and is well worth a pick in the Top 15, if not the Top 10, depending on your league's scoring.

Marc Bulger, BAL

Bye: 8

Marc Bulger signed with the Ravens to back up Joe Flacco after he was released by the Rams in April. Bulger was a standout Fantasy QB from 2003-06, but injuries and a lack of talent around him caused a rapid decline in his production, culminating last year when he was limited to eight starts due to a broken left shin and completed a career-worst 56.7 percent of his passes with five touchdowns and six interceptions. Unless something happens to Flacco this season, Bulger won't have to worry about getting hurt because he'll be on the Ravens sideline. Thus, don't count on him with a pick on Draft Day this year.

Jason Campbell, OAK

Bye: 10

The Redskins traded QB Jason Campbell to Oakland in exchange for the Raiders' fourth-round pick in the 2012 draft. The Redskins were able to part with Campbell after acquiring Donovan McNabb in a trade with Philadelphia earlier this offseason. Campbell agreed to a contract with Oakland that will pay him $3.14 million in 2010, plus a $100,000 workout bonus and $4.5 million in 2011, according to a league source. The chance to start again after being replaced by McNabb gives Campbell increased Fantasy value. We see Campbell as a low-end No. 2 Fantasy QB. The Raiders don't have a great receiving corps, but Campbell will improve Zach Miller, Chaz Schilens, Louis Murphy and Darren McFadden. Plan on drafting Campbell with a late-round pick in deep leagues.

Matt Cassel, KC

Matt Cassel enters this season with a new offensive coordinator and looking to improve in his second year as the starting QB for the Chiefs. Charlie Weis will take over calling plays on offense, which should help Cassel's development. Cassel and Weis never worked together in New England, but Weis was a big part of Tom Brady's success with the Patriots when he was the offensive coordinator there before going to Notre Dame. Cassel came to Kansas City in 2009 via trade and played well sparingly. In 15 starts he completed 271 of 493 passes (55 percent) for 2,924 yards, 16 touchdowns and 16 interceptions. He also added 189 rushing yards with three lost fumbles. The Chiefs offense should continue to improve from last year, and Cassel has sleeper potential for Fantasy owners thanks to the addition of Weis and the suddenly threatening receiving corps, which features Dwayne Bowe, Chris Chambers and rookie Dexter McCluster. We like Cassel as a No. 2 Fantasy option, but he could end up as a No. 1 QB by the end of the season. He's worth drafting with a late-round pick in all leagues this year.

Jimmy Clausen, CAR

The Carolina Panthers used their first pick in the draft to select Notre Dame QB Jimmy Clausen in the second round of the 2010 NFL Draft. Clausen will battle for a spot along the QB depth chart -- and possibly the starting job -- in training camp this summer. He also has been told that the Panthers' offense is similar to Notre Dame's, which should make the transition easy for him. It's worth keeping track of Clausen this summer since he might prove to be a decent No. 2 Fantasy QB if he can land the starting gig. But assuming he rides the bench, he'd level off as an afterthought in seasonal Fantasy leagues but stick as a middle- to late-round pick in dynasty/keeper leagues and a late first-round pick in rookie-only drafts.

Jay Cutler, CHI

While Jay Cutler set some franchise records in his first year with the Bears, they weren't the records he and the team envisioned. His 555 passing attempts and 336 completions were franchise highs, and his 3,666 yards were second-best in team history. The 27 touchdowns he threw were third-best in Bears history, and the 26 interceptions were good enough (or bad enough) for second-most. Fantasy owners weren't as happy in Cutler's performances through the first 15 games when he had all 26 of his picks, nor are they happy to see a huge drop in completion percentage (down to 60.5 pct.) or average (6.61 yards per attempt) or 300-yard games (just three of them) in 2009. Cutler even saw a dip in his rushing totals, gaining 173 yards and a single rushing touchdown. Cutler certainly is to blame for some of the Bears' offensive woes from the season, he won't get any better until the team surrounds him with an improved offensive line and when his receivers can develop further (his receiving corps has lots of potential). Those conditions might accelerate with Mike Martz named the Bears' new offensive coordinator. Martz has a strong track record of maximizing the success of quarterbacks in his system, and Cutler should be no exception. His potential is big, especially when you consider that he still finished as a Top 12 Fantasy QB in 2009. He'll be a good mid-round choice as a low-end No. 1 Fantasy passer this summer.

Jake Delhomme, CLE

Jake Delhomme signed with Cleveland this offseason where he will compete with Seneca Wallace to be the starting QB. Brady Quinn and Derek Anderson both left Cleveland (Quinn was traded to Denver and Anderson was released), which opened up the starting job. Rookie Colt McCoy is not expected to be a factor. Delhomme is coming off his worst season as a pro. He threw 18 interceptions in 2009, and the Panthers decided to cut him despite still owing him more than $12 million. Delhomme went 58-40 as a starter with Carolina, leading the franchise to its lone Super Bowl appearance to end the 2003 season. Even though Delhomme will compete for the gig and could come away with it, the reality is that he would be nothing more than a No. 2 Fantasy option in deep leagues. Ignore Delhomme in the majority of leagues on Draft Day as his best days are clearly behind him.

Brett Favre, MIN

Brett Favre agreed to play for the Vikings this season following arthroscopic ankle surgery, and as such he's expected to keep his consecutive games streak alive. Playing in Minnesota purple for the first time in '09, Favre started all 16 games despite turning 40 during the season and had a near-career year with 4,202 yards on 363 of 531 passing (68.4 pct.; 7.91 yards/att.), 33 touchdowns and only seven interceptions with two fumbles lost. But those stats aren't likely to be repeated in 2010 with his top target, Sidney Rice, expected to miss half of the season following late August hip surgery. That will do a number on Favre's stats. Consider Favre more of a low-end No. 1/top-end No. 2 choice that requires pairing with another borderline Fantasy QB just to be safe. Expect Favre to slip into the middle rounds of drafts.

Ryan Fitzpatrick, BUF

Ryan Fitzpatrick became the de facto starting quarterback in Buffalo last year when Trent Edwards got hurt and failed to prove he deserved the job. Fitzpatrick was actually serviceable for desperate Fantasy owners with two games of 24 Fantasy points in his final five starts. He finished the season completing 127 of 227 passes (56 comp. pct.) for 1,422 yards with nine touchdowns and 10 interceptions. He also added 31 carries for 141 yards and one touchdown with two lost fumbles. As of late February he will enter this season competing with Edwards and Brian Brohm for the starting job, but new coach Chan Gailey might also bring in others to add to the mix. We don't expect Fitzpatrick to open the season as the starter, but he should make the final roster. Still, he has minimal Fantasy value even if he wins the job and thus should not be drafted in any leagues.

Joe Flacco, BAL

Joe Flacco is in line to see a significant bump in stats this season. His 2009 started like gangbusters: He passed for 300-plus yards and/or had two-plus touchdowns in five of his first six games. But he had four touchdowns in his next seven and only two multi-touchdown games for the rest of the season and couldn't regain the touch he had in September and October. Still, his sophomore-season totals were better than his rookie-year numbers as he had 3,613 yards on 315 of 499 passing (63.1 percent) with 21 touchdowns and 12 interceptions. He also fumbled twice and gained just 56 yards on the season. Flacco's 2009 went from "hot" to "not," but 2010 is already looking much better thanks to the acquisitions of WRs Anquan Boldin and Donte Stallworth and the re-signing of Derrick Mason. With these legitimate receivers to help buoy the Ravens' offense, Flacco's upside is much stronger -- he has a shot at 4,000 yards. We like Flacco as a low-end No. 1/top-end No. 2 choice on Draft Day, well worth a pick as soon as Round 8. He should be in for a strong campaign.

Josh Freeman, TB

The Bucs are expected to keep Josh Freeman as their starting QB in 2010 after a tough rookie season. He showed glimpses of greatness in the Bucs' final nine games of the 2009 season with three multi-touchdown games, three games with at least 250 yards passing and five games with at least 20 yards rushing. Of course, he also had five games with at least two interceptions, four games fewer than 200 yards passing and six games where he completed fewer than 60 percent of his passes. Suffice to say, Freeman has a lot of work to do after accumulating 1,855 yards on 158 of 290 passing (54.5 percent) with 10 touchdowns, 18 interceptions and two fumbles lost. Freeman also rushed for 161 yards on 30 attempts (5.4 avg.). One problem: His receiving corps is thin as Antonio Bryant left as a free agent. He has the chance to develop rookies Arrelious Benn and Mike Williams, but they will be raw. His main target will again be TE Kellen Winslow. This could hurt Freeman's production significantly since he'll need solid receivers to catch his passes and build up his stats. For now, consider Freeman a No. 2 Fantasy QB worth a look late in deeper drafts since he does have some upside to put up points for owners.

David Garrard, JAC

A trendy Fantasy QB a year ago, David Garrard is safely considered a backup option this season. With a receiving corps that had one surprise (Mike Sims-Walker) and nothing else, Garrard passed his way to 3,597 yards on 314 of 516 passing (69.6 percent) with 15 touchdowns and 10 interceptions. Garrard's rushing totals provided a boost as he scrambled for 323 yards and three touchdowns, but he still underperformed in the eyes of those hoping for him to be a Top-12 option. The Jaguars' receiving corps remains limited, which will continue to hinder Garrard's upside. The addition of a receiver or two can change that, but Garrard is otherwise not worth a look as a starter. He should be considered a No. 2 Fantasy QB worth a late-round pick in drafts.

Bruce Gradkowski, OAK

The Raiders will likely use Bruce Gradkowski as their No. 2 QB behind Jason Campbell this season after Campbell was acquired in a trade from Washington. Gradkowski, who tore his chest muscle in a mid-April workout, hopes to be ready for training camp. But he likely won't see the field much with Campbell now in the mix. Ignore Gradkowski in all leagues on Draft Day.

Matt Hasselbeck, SEA

Matt Hasselbeck was expected to face some competition for the starting QB job in Seattle after the team acquired Charlie Whitehurst from San Diego, but he's done enough in the spring to hang on to the job. Here's the catch: if the Seahawks don't come out of the gate winning there is sure to be a quarterback change since Whitehurst is their future and Hasselbeck is their present. Injuries have also robbed Hasselbeck of playing time in recent seasons, and that could come into play during the season. Tack on that he'll be 35 when the season starts and has a limited receiving corps that's led by T.J. Houshmandzadeh and John Carlson and you don't have a very desirable Fantasy choice (the Seahawks added Golden Tate in the draft and Leon Washington via trade, which should help the offense). Hasselbeck did have another 3,000-yard season last year, but he only passed for 17 touchdowns with 17 interceptions. Hasselbeck could start off the season playing well, and he will try hard to do so as he's in a contract year, but he's ultimately just a one-week replacement option, especially when he's at home and playing a division foe. Think of him as a good, not great, No. 2 Fantasy QB worth a late-round pick.

Chad Henne, MIA

Dolphins quarterback Chad Henne has potential for a solid 2010 after being thrust into the role of starter in Week 4 last year. The addition of WR Brandon Marshall has made him more alluring to Fantasy owners in spite of his play in '09. At times he showed great poise last season and at times he was turnover prone and unsure of himself. He had three games with at least 300 passing yards in his final five outings, which bodes well for his numbers once he gets to throw to Marshall, but he only had four games with more touchdowns than interceptions in 13 starts. Again, that's a stat Marshall should be able to correct. So even though Henne completed 274 of 451 passes (60.8 percent) for 2,878 yards (6.4 yards/att.), with 12 touchdowns and 14 interceptions, he has the potential to be a solid Fantasy quarterback now that his receiving corps has improved. In each of the last three seasons Marshall's quarterback has finished as a Top-14 Fantasy option, and that includes the lesser-armed Kyle Orton in Josh McDaniels' short-area passing scheme last year. We like Henne as a No. 2 Fantasy QB with upside. He's the perfect passer to draft late and use as a backup behind one of the elite passers in Fantasy.

Tarvaris Jackson, MIN

Bye: 4
Vikings QB Tarvaris Jackson was hoping to be the team's quarterback heading into 2009, but instead he served as the backup behind Brett Favre and played sparingly. He wasn't awful, completing 14 of 21 passes for 201 yards (9.57 yards/att.) and a touchdown, but it all came in garbage time. Jackson will again serve that role in 2010. Until he's starting somewhere, Fantasy owners should consider him useless.

Kevin Kolb, PHI

Bye: 8
Kevin Kolb is the starter for the Eagles following an April trade of Donovan McNabb to the Redskins. Kolb hasn't played much, but in two starts last season in place of McNabb he had at least 325 yards and two touchdowns in each game. Granted, in one he was playing from behind against the Saints and in the other he rocked the lowly Chiefs, but he still made great use of DeSean Jackson deep (50-plus-yard completion in each game) and tight end Brent Celek in the short- and mid-range (eight catches for 104 yards in each game for Celek with a touchdown). But what we like best is that Kolb is under center for one of the most prolific passing offenses in football, and that's not going to change with McNabb gone. Many consider Kolb a sleeper, but we think the word is out with him to the point where people will consider him good enough to be a low-end No. 1 Fantasy QB. We think he's worth that in a deeper league (14-plus teams) but is otherwise a quality No. 2 Fantasy QB with upside. Look for him to come off draft boards starting in Round 7 or 8, which is terrific value. One idea: Spend back-to-back picks on Kolb and McNabb, though you might want to get Kolb first since he has a lot more potential than McNabb.

Matt Leinart, ARI

Bye: 6
Matt Leinart is expected to compete with free-agent signee Derek Anderson for the starting quarterback job in training camp with the Cardinals. Leinart was the Cardinals starter for 11 games as a rookie in 2006 but struggled with 2,547 passing yards, completing 56.8 percent of his passes with 11 touchdowns and 12 interceptions. Since then he's been a backup behind Kurt Warner, who has since retired. Moreover, the Cardinals' pass attack has taken a hit after Anquan Boldin was traded to Baltimore. Leinart still has one of the best receivers in the NFL with Larry Fitzgerald, and Steve Breaston and Early Doucet are developing talents. Even his offensive line got a boost with the late-April signing of left guard Alan Faneca. But the reality is that whoever is the starting quarterback for the Cardinals in 2010 is worth taking with a middle- to late-round pick as a quality No. 2 passer.

Eli Manning, NYG

Bye: 8
Are the Giants becoming a passing team? It sure looked that way in 2009 with Brandon Jacobs and Ahmad Bradshaw struggled while Eli Manning and his young receivers shined. We anticipate seeing more of the same this season from Manning, who set new career highs in passing yards (4,021) and touchdowns (27) while throwing just 14 interceptions. The Giants have plenty of improving talent in their receiving corps with Steve Smith, Hakeem Nicks, Mario Manningham and Kevin Boss, so expectations are high for Manning, who for the first time in his career comes into the season as a projected No. 1 Fantasy QB. He is worth drafting after the elite quarterbacks come off the board with a mid-round pick and is good enough to start in 12-team leagues. Another 4,000-yard season with 25-plus touchdowns is a definite possibility with the talent around him.

Peyton Manning, IND

Bye: 7
Unless we lie, nothing we can tell you will make you change your mind on considering Peyton Manning as a No. 1 Fantasy QB. But we're not lying when we tell you that he's not the No. 1 overall Fantasy QB in 2010 -- just a Top 3 choice at his position. Manning will remain the centerpiece of the Colts' incredible passing game, and he's a lock for over 4,000 yards and 25-plus touchdowns (he's done that nearly every season since he entered the league). Last year was no different when he completed 68.8 percent of his passes (393 of 571 passing) for 4,500 yards and 33 touchdowns with 16 interceptions with no fumbles lost. So if the likes of Drew Brees and potentially Aaron Rodgers are picked ahead of Manning in most leagues, along with a glut of elite running backs, that could mean that Manning falls to Round 2. We can't think of a safer second-round pick in Fantasy this year than Manning, who should still ultimately be a Top 15 selection or so in drafts this summer. He's in line for another big season with an elite receiving corps of Reggie Wayne, Dallas Clark, Anthony Gonzalez, Pierre Garcon and Austin Collie.

Colt McCoy, CLE

Bye: 8
The Browns spent a third-round pick on Texas QB Colt McCoy in the 2010 NFL Draft. He slipped in the draft due to concerns about his height and overall ability. The Browns plan to take it slowly with McCoy, but with the only passers standing in his way being Jake Delhomme and Seneca Wallace, there's a chance to get in the game. McCoy isn't worth a pick in seasonal drafts but is worth a late-round choice in dynasty/keeper leagues and a pick between 10th and 20th overall in rookie-only formats.

Donovan McNabb, WAS

Bye: 9
Donovan McNabb was traded to the Redskins in early April and will command Mike Shanahan's offense following one of his brightest seasons in Philadelphia in 2009. The Redskins have some good receivers in Santana Moss, Chris Cooley, Devin Thomas and Malcolm Kelly but they're not as threatening as what McNabb had in Philly, so we expect his stats to come down a bit from his 2009 totals. Furthermore, Shanahan's version of the West Coast offense values the running back and will make use of McNabb's backfield, which means he won't throw as much in Washington as he did in Philadelphia, where Andy Reid's play calling meant lots of attempts. Putting aside the "name value", we consider McNabb a low-end No. 1/high-end No. 2 Fantasy QB worth a mid-round pick. McNabb does have motivation on his side -- he's playing in the same division as the team that traded him and looking for a new contract. And that could go a long way toward him still playing like a solid Fantasy QB this season.

Matt Moore, CAR

Matt Moore's late-season surge in 2009 has him in front for the starting QB job with the team in 2010, though he'll receive some competition. Moore took over for Jake Delhomme over the final five games of last season and was sensational with a 299-yard game against the Vikings and a pair of three-touchdown outings against the Vikings and Giants. In total Moore completed 85 of 138 passes (61.6 pct.) for 1,053 yards with eight touchdowns and two interceptions. Moore signed his restricted tender in mid-March, guaranteeing him a $3 million salary on a one-year deal, which means he's eligible for a new deal after 2010. But with the Panthers drafting Jimmy Clausen in April, there's nothing promised the upstart youngster. Consider Moore a low-end No. 2 Fantasy QB worth a late-round pick in deeper leagues only – so long as he keeps Clausen on the bench. His more popular status will be as a capable one-week option off waivers during the season when the Panthers have a good matchup.

Kyle Orton, DEN

Kyle Orton will see a lot of changes in Denver this season. For starters, Brandon Marshall was traded to the Dolphins in mid-April. Marshall was responsible for many of Orton's career-best stats in 2009, including 3,802 yards passing and 21 touchdowns (Marshall had 10 of those). Without Marshall, the Broncos' receiving corps is led by 2009 disappointment Eddie Royal, veteran journeyman Jabar Gaffney and rookie Demaryius Thomas – not exactly quality wideouts. Along with that, the Broncos added Brady Quinn in a trade from Cleveland and drafted Tim Tebow in the first round. Orton is expected to remain the starter this season, but his days in Denver are limited after this year. He's gone from a potential sleeper No. 2 Fantasy QB to a guy who might not get drafted in the majority of leagues.

Carson Palmer, CIN

Carson Palmer is hoping to improve this season after a disappointing 2009. Expectations were relatively high for Palmer heading into 2009. Coming off of elbow surgery and primed for a big season, he wound up handing off nearly as often as he dropped back to pass and thus posted disappointing totals. Palmer finished with 3,094 yards on 282 of 466 passing (60.5 percent) with 21 touchdowns and 13 interceptions. Palmer also scampered for three touchdowns and added a career-best 93 rush yards. But his passing totals were way down from where we remembered them from 2005 to 2007. One reason for it: The Bengals' passing game was pathetic. Once the team lost WR Chris Henry, Palmer had two multi-touchdown games passing and only one game over 250 yards. Sure, Chad Ochocinco had a good year, but the Bengals' pass attack was pretty easy to stop once he was blanketed. The Bengals addressed their receiving corps with the additions of Terrell Owens, Matt Jones and Antonio Bryant as free agents and Jermaine Gresham, Jordan Shipley and Dezmon Briscoe in the NFL Draft. Namely the Owens addition gives Palmer a better option opposite Ochocinco, potentially enough to get him over 4,000 yards. At least it's clear that the Bengals want to throw a little more in 2010. For now, consider Palmer a solid backup Fantasy QB worth a middle-to late-round pick in standard formats and a low-end starter in leagues with 14-plus teams.

Philip Rivers, SD

Philip Rivers continued to prove he's among the best quarterbacks in the NFL and one of the top Fantasy options in 2009, but 2010 could be a different story. He enters this season looking for his third year in a row with at least 4,000 passing yards and he also has four years in a row with at least 22 touchdowns and completing at least 60 percent of his passes. But those totals were helped along by the play of WR Vincent Jackson, who is holding out this offseason and might play only the final six games of the 2010 season. Without Jackson, who is also suspended for the first three games of the year for violating the NFL's policy on substance abuse, Rivers would still have TE Antonio Gates and WR Malcom Floyd to throw to, but he'd easily miss having Jackson join them. For now it's safe to consider Rivers a solid No. 1 Fantasy QB, but be mindful of this issue. If Jackson's holdout lasts deep into training camp, we'd recommend downgrading Rivers to a low-end No. 1 Fantasy QB worth a pick after at least seven or eight quarterbacks go off the board.

Aaron Rodgers, GB

You couldn't do better than Aaron Rodgers in Fantasy Football in 2009 -- no one scored more points than he did in standard-scoring leagues. Rodgers continued to make the Packers brass look like geniuses when he topped all of his 2008 stats. He completed 350 of 541 passes (64.7 pct.) for 4,434 yards (8.20 yards/att.) with 30 touchdowns vs. only seven interceptions. Rodgers also ran for 316 yards and tacked on five touchdowns on 58 carries (5.4 avg.). This doesn't include a 423-yard, five-total-touchdown game at Arizona in the playoffs. Every single regular-season stat listed was a career-high for him, and the ceiling still hasn't been touched since he didn't make use of some of his improving weapons like TE Jermichael Finley, WR James Jones and WR Jordy Nelson on a weekly basis. Tack on an offensive line that also has room to improve and you've got quite possibly the next Drew Brees, Peyton Manning or Tom Brady in that Rodgers will be surrounded by so much great talent that he'll easily post solid totals. There's no question that Rodgers is a top-end No. 1 Fantasy QB worth a pick between the end of Round 1 and the end of Round 2 depending on how quarterbacks are scored in your league.

Ben Roethlisberger, PIT

The NFL suspended Ben Roethlisberger for six games for violating the NFL's personal conduct policy. The suspension could be reduced to four games based on Roethlisberger's behavior, but his Fantasy value has taken a hit. The Steelers also traded Santonio Holmes, and his weapons aren't the same as 2009 when he had a career year with 4,328 yards. The 26 touchdowns he threw were second-best, but he also added 12 interceptions and three fumbles lost and ran for 82 yards and a pair of touchdowns. Roethlisberger still has the chance to post quality stats once he returns from the suspension, but he should only be considered a No. 2 Fantasy QB. Plan on drafting him with a late-round pick and hope he gets the suspension reduced from six games to four.

Tony Romo, DAL

Tony Romo went from a questionable Fantasy option entering 2009 to returning as one of the elite Fantasy quarterbacks coming into this season. Romo has arguably the best receiving corps of his career -- the Terrell Owens era included -- with Miles Austin and Jason Witten playing at a Pro Bowl level and with contributions from Roy Williams, Patrick Crayton and his running backs. That WR corps was then improved with the addition of rookie WR Dez Bryant in the draft. Romo re-established himself in 2009 with a career-high 4,483 passing yards, completing 63.1 percent of his passes, with 26 touchdowns and nine interceptions. He also added 105 rushing yards and a touchdown. It was the second 4,000-yard passing season in his career and the third year in a row he had at least 26 touchdowns. The nine interceptions were also a career low. We like Romo as a No. 1 Fantasy option again this year, and he should be drafted beginning in Round 3, giving him tremendous value. He will continue to connect with all his weapons, especially Austin and Witten, and look for Romo to have another solid year.

JaMarcus Russell, FA

JaMarcus Russell was released from the Raiders in May after the Raiders traded for Jason Campbell from the Redskins. He could land with another team, but he won't be given the chance to start. Keep an eye on what happens with Russell, but he should not be drafted in any Fantasy leagues.

Matt Ryan, ATL

Matt Ryan's second season got off to a fantastic start before a midseason slide and a toe injury robbed him of putting up incredible stats, then finished strong. It all has built hope that he'll be fantastic for all of the 2010 season as a potential starting Fantasy QB. In 14 starts (effectively 13 games as his toe injury cost him much of his Week 12 matchup with the Buccaneers), Ryan had 2,916 yards passing on 263 of 451 passing (58.3 percent) with 22 touchdowns and 14 interceptions. He also rushed for one score and fumbled twice. Ryan needs to improve his consistency and lower his turnovers if he's going to be a Fantasy mainstay in 2010, but he's got the skills to do just that. With a year of working with Tony Gonzalez under his belt and great rapport built with Roddy White, Ryan should have the tools to have a smashing third season. We consider Ryan to be a low-end No. 1/top-end No. 2 Fantasy QB with upside to be a solid starter. Best of all, he can be reeled in with a mid-round pick in drafts, making him a medium-risk, high-reward Fantasy option.

Bye: 4

Mark Sanchez, NYJ

Mark Sanchez had better team success as a rookie in 2009 than he did for Fantasy owners, but he enters his second year loaded of promise. Sanchez took the Jets to the AFC Championship Game and showed the kind of potential you like to see from a young QB. His stats in the playoffs were impressive (539 passing yards, four touchdowns and two interceptions in three games), and there's hope for him to improve this season. But during the year, Sanchez played like a rookie. He completed only 196 of 364 passes (53.8 percent) for 2,444 yards, 12 touchdowns and 20 interceptions. He also ran for 106 yards and three touchdowns with three lost fumbles. The Jets receiving corps, which is led by Santonio Holmes, Braylon Edwards, Jerricho Cotchery and Dustin Keller, is expected to give Sanchez every opportunity to play real well. But the Jets are a run-first team, and Sanchez is still learning how to play in the NFL. Because of those factors he should be considered a No. 2 Fantasy QB worth only a late-round pick. He has the ability to surprise you and play like a starting option on occasion, but don't go into the year with him pegged for that role.

Matt Schaub, HOU

After playing 16 games and meeting huge expectations last year, more of the same is expected from Texans QB Matt Schaub in 2010. Ending his season with the Pro Bowl MVP award, Schaub dazzled with an NFL-best 4,770 yards on 396 of 583 passing (67.9 percent) with 29 touchdowns, 15 interceptions and two fumbles lost. Keep in mind, these numbers came with TE Owen Daniels missing half the season and Kevin Walter declining statistically. There's potential for a 5,000-yard season here in 2010 -- especially with the Texans' run game a mess and Andre Johnson prowling down the field, along with Daniels and Walter back. Health is the only factor for Schaub, though he has been essentially injury-free for over a year. Best of all, no one is considering Schaub early in drafts, so he's a tremendous value as a No. 1 Fantasy QB between Rounds 2 and 3. When you see Peyton Manning and Aaron Rodgers go off of draft boards, Schaub is sure to follow.

Alex Smith, SF

Alex Smith is back as the starting QB in San Francisco, and this time he plans to keep the job. The former No. 1 overall pick in 2005 lost the starting position due to shoulder injuries and inconsistent play, but he was given a second chance in 2009 when Shaun Hill struggled. Smith never looked back as he did well developing a rapport with Vernon Davis and Michael Crabtree. Smith showed his potential during a three-game stretch last season against Green Bay, Jacksonville and Seattle with 769 yards, seven touchdowns and one interception, which put him on the Fantasy radar again. He finished the season completing a career-high 60.5 percent of his passes for 2,350 yards, 18 touchdowns and 12 interceptions. He is a No. 2 Fantasy option coming into the season (which happens to be a potential contract year), but he can be a spot starter in standard leagues with the chance to increase his value if he picks up where last season ended. Davis has become an elite TE, and Crabtree has the chance to continue his development. If the 49ers find a third receiving threat -- outside of Frank Gore, who is a great receiver out of the backfield -- then Smith's stats could really explode. We never thought Smith would be Fantasy relevant again, but here he is with the chance to keep getting better.

Matthew Stafford, DET

Bye: 7

In terms of NFL growth and development, Matthew Stafford had a good rookie year with the Lions. In terms of Fantasy Football, Stafford was a nightmare. Stafford completed 201 of 377 passes (53.3 comp. pct.) for 2,267 yards (6.01 yards/att.) with 13 touchdowns and a whopping 20 interceptions over 10 games (that's an average of two interceptions per game). Save for a gutsy performance vs. the Browns in Week 11 that saw Stafford suffer a separated left (non-throwing) shoulder while tossing for 422 yards and five touchdowns, he was fairly useless for Fantasy play even though he delivered either a rushing or passing touchdown in every game he played. Stafford was banged up over the course of the season, dislocating his right kneecap in addition to hurting his shoulder, but he has undergone surgery and should be fine for the start of the 2010 season. If the Lions bulk up their offensive line to better protect Stafford, he'll have a chance to stay productive and useful to Fantasy owners. His receiving corps is just fine: The Lions added Nate Burleson and Tony Scheffler to go with Calvin Johnson and Brandon Pettigrew, so Stafford has plenty of quality targets to throw to. Consider him a good No. 2 option in drafts, well worth a late-round pick.

Tim Tebow, DEN

Bye: 9

The Broncos drafted Florida QB Tim Tebow with the No. 25 overall pick in the first round of the NFL Draft. But Tebow isn't expected to play right away. Denver coach Josh McDaniels insisted Kyle Orton is still his starting quarterback - and chances are good that Brady Quinn is still the backup and Tom Brandstater is still No. 3. With his athleticism, Tebow could play other positions - say, tight end or on special teams - and he could be used in Wildcat formations right away to take advantage of his running prowess even if he doesn't supplant Orton. That means Tebow has minimal Fantasy value in seasonal leagues even if he lines up in other places on offense. In rookie-only drafts, Tebow is worth a late-round pick, but he has value in long-term keeper leagues since he could be the starter for the Broncos in 2011. We'll find out how the Broncos plan to use Tebow, and it should be interesting to see if he has the chance to make an impact as a rookie.

Michael Vick, PHI

Bye: 8

Michael Vick is expected to serve as the backup to Kevin Kolb in Philadelphia this season. Vick will again play in a Wildcat role, which will give him a handful of reps each week, but not enough to make him a Fantasy standout. He's only worth a late-round pick in the deepest of leagues, or in leagues that use multiple starting quarterbacks.

Seneca Wallace, CLE

Bye: 8

Seneca Wallace is headed from Seattle to Cleveland this year after his former coach, Mike Holmgren, who is now the team president for the Browns, traded for him. Wallace will compete with Jake Delhomme to be the new starter in Cleveland (rookie Colt McCoy is not expected to be a factor). Wallace might have an edge based on his familiarity with Holmgren, but Delhomme has far more experience as a starter. Wallace has started 10 games the past two years and has 14 touchdowns and five interceptions despite his limited play over that time, so the potential is there for Wallace to be successful. But with the Browns, Wallace would only be a low-end No. 2 Fantasy QB at best. Cleveland has a limited receiving corps, and they aren't going to turn into a passing team any time soon. Don't draft Wallace in the majority of Fantasy leagues even if he wins the job, but he could be worth adding off the waiver wire during the year.

Charlie Whitehurst, SEA

Bye: 5

Charlie Whitehurst was supposed to battle for the starting QB job in Seattle with Matt Hasselbeck after getting traded there in mid-March, but those plans are on hold. That's because Whitehurst didn't have a good spring and Hasselbeck did, making him the de facto starter entering camp. Whitehurst has never attempted an NFL pass after being in the league four seasons as the emergency No. 3 QB with the Chargers. He has the size you want in a passer and a good arm, but his lack of experience is of great concern. Keep him off of Fantasy rosters -- he might get a chance to play later in the year but you can glance on waivers for him by then.

Vince Young, TEN

Bye: 9

Vince Young is expected to be a wild card late in Fantasy drafts this summer after getting his career back on track in 2009. The Titans started last season 0-6 and turned to Young to spark the offense, and spark he did as the team won eight of the 10 starts he made. His stats weren't huge - he threw for 1,879 yards on 152 of 259 passing (58.7 percent) with one game over 250 yards (a career-high 387-yard delight vs. Arizona). Young's rushing totals weren't gaudy, either: He had 281 yards on 55 runs (5.1 avg.) with two rushing touchdowns. Owners will be tempted to draft Young hoping to cash in on moderate passing totals with strong rushing totals - after all, 175 yards passing and 50 yards rushing is the same as 300 yards passing in standard Fantasy scoring. But Young might hand off more than you'd like thanks to Chris Johnson in the backfield, so his totals aren't expected to be huge, even with the Titans' receiving corps gathering some momentum thanks to their young talent. Treat him like a No. 2 Fantasy QB worth a late-round flier in drafts.

Running Backs

Joseph Addai, IND

Bye: 7

Entering 2010 in a contract year, Colts RB Joseph Addai should be more than capable of giving Fantasy owners some quality stats. Naturally, we expect him to be motivated to play well so that he can cash in following the season, but he also told CBSSports.com in January that the addition of Donald Brown motivated him last year. It showed as he rushed for 10 touchdowns, caught for three more and had 828 yards on 219 carries (3.8 avg.) to go with 336 yards on 51 receptions (6.6 avg.). He had another 265 total yards with a touchdown in three playoff games. Addai might be the most unsuspecting member of the Top 12 Fantasy rushers from last season, and because he plays in Indianapolis' powerful offense, he's not expected to fall out very easily. The biggest threat to Addai is Donald Brown, who totaled just 89 touches in the regular season thanks to an injury that kept him out of several games down the stretch. Brown could see more work next season, and that could limit Addai's touches. But it's clear that Addai, who has been good for at least 1,100 yards and eight touchdowns in three seasons with 15-plus games, is far from washed up and unlikely to lose the majority of reps to Brown. Best of all, Addai might sneak into Round 3 or even 4 in some leagues, making him a valuable pick. It's probably best to treat him as a No. 2 RB, but expectations for quality stats should be high.

Marion Barber, DAL

Bye: 4

Marion Barber has a lot to prove to Fantasy owners this season after a disappointing 2009. Barber was expected to lead the Cowboys backfield and outplay young running backs Felix Jones and Tashard Choice. Instead, Barber had an injury-marred season and finished with modest totals (932 rushing yards and seven touchdowns and 26 catches for 221 yards). He did lead Dallas in carries with 214, which was more than Jones (116) and Choice (64), but Jones also missed time due to injuries. Barber clearly is not an elite Fantasy option, and his touchdowns continue to decline. He went from 16 total touchdowns in 2006 to 12 in 2007 to nine in 2008. You can't count on him for double digits in touchdowns any more, and the Cowboys have learned to love their passing attack while utilizing all three of their rushers. Thus, expect Jones to see a bigger role this year and even start as Dallas will try to keep Barber fresh for the end of the season, and look for Choice to see his share of carries, too. Barber still gets enough touches and production to make him a low-end No. 2 Fantasy RB, but he's toward the end of that group. He should not be selected before Round 4 on Draft Day.

Mike Bell, PHI

Bye: 8

Mike Bell resurrected his career with the Saints in 2009, winning a Super Bowl ring along the way, and he'll hope to do the same with the Eagles in 2010. As a restricted free agent, Bell signed a one-year offer sheet with Philadelphia that was not matched by New Orleans. He's expected to aid LeSean McCoy much like he did Pierre Thomas last year, and he could fit into a goal-line role in addition to taking snaps from McCoy. Bell had 654 yards on 172 carries (3.8 avg.) with five rushing scores and 12 yards receiving on four grabs last year, and those are mostly reachable totals for Bell this season. Despite missing the start of camp with a hamstring injury, look his way with a late-round pick as a good reserve Fantasy RB.

Cedric Benson, CIN

Bye: 6

Cedric Benson is looking to keep improving this season. He had a career year in 2009, totaling 1,251 yards on 301 carries (4.2 avg.) in 13 games (he missed two games with an injury and sat out Week 17) with six touchdowns. Benson also caught 17 passes for 111 yards and didn't lose a single fumble all year. Benson, who will be 28 to start the season, is in a contract year and could earn another big contract with a strong campaign. Really, the fact that his health isn't perfect (no 16-game seasons) and that he's on a team that will likely throw the ball more than they did last season are the only knocks against Benson, who has been awesome since he's joined the Bengals. We consider him a low-end No. 1 Fantasy RB worthy of being taken between 10th and 20th overall in drafts this summer.

Jahvid Best, DET

Bye: 7

The Lions drafted Jahvid Best at No. 30 overall in the NFL Draft, and landing in Motown could be a blessing for him. Best, who ran for 2,668 yards, caught 62 passes and scored 35 total touchdowns at California, is expected to share carries with Kevin Smith, who is coming off of major knee surgery. Because Smith was ready to roll at the start of training camp, chances are Best will not land all of the Lions' reps right away. Look for a split between the two rushers, though Best clearly has more upside and potential. A well-documented concussion suffered at Cal last season is of minor concern -- go into the season with Best as a No. 3 Fantasy RB worth a mid-round pick with the chance to be a No. 2 option by the end of the year. In rookie-only drafts, Best should be considered a first-round pick, and he has plenty of value in keeper leagues with an early- to mid-round selection.

Ahmad Bradshaw, NYG

Bye: 8

Ahmad Bradshaw is expected to be fine after offseason surgery on both feet and his right ankle, and he could be in a position to take off in 2010. After dealing with injuries for most of 2009, Bradshaw had screws put in both feet to stabilize fractured bones and a procedure on his ankle. Despite the injuries, Bradshaw had his moments playing in tandem with Brandon Jacobs, and he will continue in that role this season. Bradshaw set new career highs in 2009 with 163 carries for 778 yards (4.8 avg.) and seven touchdowns, and he tacked on 207 yards on 21 catches. He vows to be better this season now that he's 100 percent, and we think that's possible. Jacobs remains the starter and goal-line option based on his size, but Bradshaw could approach 1,000 rushing yards and a healthy amount of touchdowns in what amounts to a contract year for him. We consider Bradshaw a solid No. 3 Fantasy RB, just like his counterpart in The Big Apple, making him worth a mid-round pick in all leagues.

Donald Brown, IND

Bye: 7

Team-oriented RB Donald Brown is expected to be healthy for the 2010 season after missing five games in 2009 with a shoulder injury. As a rookie, Brown amassed just 281 yards on 78 carries (3.6 avg.) with three touchdowns, adding 169 receiving yards on 11 grabs. Those numbers were way off from what we expected from him, but he likely played hurt for much of the year and that led to the low totals. He should return to being a significant contributor in the Colts' offense, but so long as starter Joseph Addai is healthy, we'll never see Brown top more than 15 touches or so on a weekly basis (he hit that mark just twice in 2009). You're best off considering Brown a very low-end No. 3 RB or a quality reserve rusher, making him worthy of a mid-round pick. And naturally, if you draft Addai with a Top-30 choice, you should look into getting Brown as an insurance policy.

Ronnie Brown, MIA

Bye: 5

For the second time in three seasons, Dolphins running back Ronnie Brown will enter training camp coming off a season-ending injury. This time, Brown's 2009 season was cut short after nine games due to a Lisfranc fracture in his right foot. But Brown said in an interview with CBSsports.com in February that he's on track to return for the start of the 2010 season. "The toughest part of being injured is not being able to participate and go out there," Brown said. "To suffer an injury and not being able to go out there and help your team, it was hard for me. I used what happened this season as fuel for next season." Despite the injuries, Brown has been productive with 18 touchdowns in the past two seasons. He finished 2009 with 648 rush yards, 98 receiving yards and nine total touchdowns (one passing). He will continue to share carries with Ricky Williams in 2010, but Brown is expected to return as the starter. And while the Dolphins did trade for Brandon Marshall, the team should still be focused on running the ball a good amount of the time. Go into the season with Brown as a No. 2 Fantasy running back worth a pick beginning in Round 3 in all leagues -- his foot injury is serious but not as serious as the ACL he tore in 2007. When healthy, Brown is a must-start option in all formats.

Correll Buckhalter, DEN

Bye: 9

Correll Buckhalter is expected to serve as a part-time running back in Denver behind starter Knowshon Moreno, though early training camp injuries threw that plan into the wind. Buckhalter's injury wasn't believed to be significant, so he should be OK for this season. In 2009, Buckhalter's first year with the Broncos, he had 120 carries for 642 yards (5.3 yard avg.) with one touchdown. He also caught 31 passes for 240 yards with two lost fumbles. Buckhalter actually had two more 100-yard games than Moreno, but Moreno is clearly the future in Denver and should see more reps in 2010 so long as he is healthy. But that's the catch as Moreno has dealt with injuries throughout his short career and it's not ridiculous to think that Buckhalter could see some significant reps this season. Buckhalter is worth a late-round pick in all Fantasy leagues this year and is a must-own handcuff option for Moreno owners.

Michael Bush, OAK

Bye: 10

Michael Bush enters his third season in the NFL looking for a chance to prove he can be a productive running back, and he should improve with the Raiders going from three options to two with Justin Fargas being released. Bush will continue to share carries with Darren McFadden, but his outlook has gotten better and thus his potential is better. In two seasons, Bush has 218 carries for 1,010 yards (4.6 yards per carry) and six touchdowns. He's also added 36 catches for 267 yards and three lost fumbles. If Bush were the featured back for the Raiders he could end up as a very strong option. But since he shares carries, that lowers his value, and he should be viewed carefully as a No. 3 RB worth a pick between Rounds 7 and 8. He does benefit from being in a potential contract year (motivation will be high), but McFadden is still considered by many to be the better talent.

Reggie Bush, NO

Bye: 10

Reggie Bush should continue to be a home-run threat in the Saints' offense, but the RB has work to do to match his lofty expectations. Bush matched a career-high in total touchdowns with eight in 2009, but the rest of his stats declined dramatically, delivering 390 rush yards on 70 carries (5.6 avg.) and 335 receiving yards on 47 catches (7.1 avg.). His rushing and receiving stats were career-lows, and many attribute his limited reps to complications from his surgically repaired knee, which required attention for much of the season and kept him out of two games. He was improved for the postseason with 117 rush yards on 17 carries and a touchdown along with 95 yards and a score on 10 catches. Bush's contract gets steep this season, but we can't see the Saints without their explosive weapon, even if his numbers don't correlate to how important he is to them. If Bush stays off the operating table, we could see him bounce back and see more work in 2010. Consider him a No. 3 Fantasy RB, which is what he was in 2009, worth a pick between Rounds 6 and 7 in drafts.

Jamaal Charles, KC

Bye: 4

Jamaal Charles was expected to be a breakout star this season, but that was before the Chiefs added Thomas Jones in March and rookie WR Dexter McCluster in April. Charles was a star in the second half of 2009 when he took over for Larry Johnson. In the final eight games of the season, Charles had seven games with double digits in Fantasy points. He finished the season with 190 carries for 1,120 yards (5.9 yards per carry) and seven touchdowns and 40 catches for 297 yards and one touchdown with three lost fumbles. If you project what Charles did in his final eight games for the entire season he would have had 320 carries for 1,936 yards and 14 touchdowns. But with Jones now in the mix, Charles won't get the chance to match those stats, and McCluster should take away some receptions. We still like Charles as a No. 2 Fantasy RB. Even though Jones will likely get the short-yardage and goal-line carries, the Chiefs will be pass happy with Charlie Weis now the offensive coordinator. Charles should still be drafted in Round 3 or 4, and hopefully Jones won't ruin his value altogether. But Jones coming to Kansas City definitely takes the luster off what could have been a breakout year.

Tashard Choice, DAL

Bye: 4

On any other team Tashard Choice would be a candidate to share carries as part of a tandem and be a quality Fantasy reserve RB. But in Dallas, Choice is the No. 3 RB behind Marion Barber and Felix Jones, and that limits his Fantasy value. Choice is a great injury replacement when Barber or Jones gets hurt, but he's not someone you can draft in the majority of leagues. Instead, add Choice to your scout team and make sure you pick him up off the waiver wire the minute something happens to Barber or Jones. And in deep leagues, spend a late-round pick on Choice since he's been a good replacement for a couple of weeks each of the past two seasons. There's also talk he could get short-yardage work this season, but until we see it happen we can't recommend Choice in the majority of leagues on Draft Day.

Glen Coffee, SF

Glen Coffee was expected to be the backup to Frank Gore this season, but he abruptly retired in mid-August. Assuming he follows through with his retirement, Fantasy owners shouldn't bother considering the young rusher. Rookie Anthony Dixon and veteran Michael Robinson will battle for the right to back up Gore.

Kenneth Darby, STL

Kenneth Darby will serve as a backup RB in St. Louis behind starter Steven Jackson. Darby has minimal Fantasy value unless Jackson gets hurt. In three years, Darby is still looking for his first touchdown. He only has 61 carries in his career and 301 rushing yards. Darby is worth drafting with a late-round pick as a handcuff option for Jackson, but he should only be considered an insurance policy this season. And if Jackson does get hurt he would only be useful as a reserve RB in deeper formats.

James Davis, CLE

James Davis enters this season looking for a bigger role. Davis missed much of the 2009 season with a shoulder injury suffered during a practice drill four weeks into the season. The hard-nosed Davis had just nine carries for 15 yards in 2009 to go with 5 yards on four catches, but we think he can bring a good strong presence to the Browns run game with five-to-10 touches per game behind starter Jerome Harrison. Granted, there's a lot of time between now and the start of the season, but Davis is someone we'll be keeping an eye on. He's worth a late-round pick in deeper dynasty/keeper leagues this summer.

Justin Fargas, DEN

Justin Fargas signed with the Broncos in mid-August, and it's there where he'll look for a roster spot. He'll have a chance to get one as the Broncos' backfield was decimated by injuries during the first two weeks of training camp. Fargas has seen his production decrease each of the past two years, and he has been plagued by injuries which comes with the territory of getting older. He's not worth drafting at this point but if he has a great preseason and if the Broncos' other rushers don't get healthy, he will carry some value with a late-round flier.

Kevin Faulk, NE

Kevin Faulk re-signed with the Patriots and will again be in a contract year in 2010. He was a solid part of the backfield rotation in 2009 with 62 carries for 335 yards (5.4 yards per carry) and two touchdowns. He also added 37 catches for 301 yards and a touchdown with a lost fumble. But since he shares the ball with Laurence Maroney, Sammy Morris and Fred Taylor, Faulk has minimal Fantasy value. He's a decent reserve Fantasy RB in deep leagues where receptions count since he's had at least 35 catches in his past four seasons, but that's about the only format where he should be owned.

Justin Forsett, SEA

Justin Forsett will attempt to be the starting RB for the Seahawks this year, but he's expected to share carries with Julius Jones and Leon Washington. We still like Forsett the best based on his upside. When he got the chance to carry the load in 2009, he played well as a rusher and receiver. We expect Forsett to be the starter in a shared situation with Jones on rushing downs, and Washington will likely see the field in passing situations. Plan on drafting Forsett as a No. 3 Fantasy RB coming into the season. He is worth a mid-round pick in all leagues.

Matt Forte, CHI

After racking up 12 touchdowns and just over 1,700 total yards as a rookie, Bears RB Matt Forte took a massive step backward in 2009. Forte failed to top 1,000 rush yards, getting just 929 on 258 carries (3.6 avg.) with four scores on the ground. He also dipped a bit as a receiver, catching 57 passes for 471 yards (8.3 avg.). He also lost three fumbles after losing just one as a rookie. Only seven times all season did Forte match or exceed 10 Fantasy points in standard-scoring leagues and totaled over 100 yards in six games. Though he didn't get much help from his plodding offensive line, Forte appeared to be the latest in a long line of Bears running backs that shine in their debut season and struggle in the next. Injuries might be to blame – he tore a hamstring before the season started and underwent arthroscopic surgery on his left knee after the season. But offseason additions of offensive coordinator Mike Martz and veteran running back Chester Taylor do not bode well for Forte's future. Taylor has nearly the exact same skill set as Forte while Martz has been known as a running back crusher in Fantasy Football because he likes to throw so much. We can no longer expect Forte to be a candidate for 20 touches per week, and there could be some matchups where 15 touches are too much to ask for. Forte has slid to a No. 3 Fantasy RB, worth a pick after Round 6. He has a lot of work to do to get back to Fantasy prominence.

Arian Foster, HOU

Fantasy owners got a nice look at Arian Foster late last season, but they'll get a better look at him this season. With the season-ending injury to rookie RB Ben Tate, Foster appears to be in line to start for Houston and take on a considerable role. Foster was given extended reps in the team's last two games last season and torched the Dolphins and Patriots for 216 yards on 39 carries (5.5 avg.) with three touchdowns and three catches for 26 yards. Though he is expected to share the field with Steve Slaton, there's a realistic chance that Foster will handle much of the "running down" duties while Slaton will take on the "passing down" work. Best of all, Foster could produce exceptionally well but fall into your lap on Draft Day. Play it safe and pick him as a No. 3 Fantasy RB with a pick in Round 7 or 8, but don't be shocked if he comes through for you in 2010. He certainly looks like he'll get the opportunity.

Quinton Ganthier, SEA

Bye: 5

Quinton Ganthier left the Redskins and signed with the Seahawks this offseason where he could compete for carries behind Justin Forsett, Leon Washington and Julius Jones. He could end up being used in short-yardage situations, and there's also talk of Ganthier being moved to fullback. We view Ganthier as a reserve in Seattle, and he isn't worth drafting in the majority of leagues. He could be worth adding off the waiver wire if he starts out the season playing well, but Ganthier is more of an insurance policy and special teams player. He showed some flashes of his ability in 2009 when Clinton Portis (concussion) and Ladell Betts (knee) were injured, but in three seasons he has just 71 carries for 262 yards and three touchdowns and 15 catches for 142 yards. You can do better.

Toby Gerhart, MIN

Bye: 4

The Vikings took Stanford RB Toby Gerhart in the second round of the NFL draft, giving them a suitable second running option behind starter Adrian Peterson. Gerhart is expected to replace Chester Taylor as the second back in the Vikings offense. He isn't going to take many stats off the plate of one of the best running back in the NFL, but he's a must-own as an insurance policy for those owners who take AP with a first-round pick, and better yet you can wait until Round 10 or so to get him; last year you'd have to take Chester Taylor sooner. Gerhart is also worth a middle- to late-round pick in dynasty/keeper leagues and is a Top 20 pick in rookie-only drafts.

Bye: 6

Mike Goodson impressed teammates in training camp in 2009 with his excellent speed and hands, but it never translated out on the field. Goodson only played in eight games, rushing for just 49 yards on 22 carries (with 44 yards and 13 carries coming in the season finale). He also caught a pair of passes for 15 yards. Obviously, these totals suggest that Goodson isn't worth owning in Fantasy, but he could be a dangerous option if he ever found regular playing time. That said, don't consider him useful in seasonal Fantasy play for now, but do keep him in mind in case the Panthers' running back corps suffers some injuries in 2010.

Frank Gore, SF

Bye: 9

Frank Gore continues to be one of the best Fantasy running backs available, and he should be considered a first-round pick in all leagues. Gore has at least 1,400 total yards in each of the past four seasons, and in 2009 he set a new career-high with 10 rushing touchdowns (and 13 overall). He's a great receiver out of the backfield with more than 50 catches in three of the past four years, and he's a rare RB who still continues to get the majority of touches out of the backfield. He will lose a few carries to Glen Coffee and rookie Anthony Dixon, but Gore is a standout RB. He did miss two games last year with an ankle injury and has missed five games in the past three seasons, but he's also averaged 233 carries a year for his career. We see Gore going toward the end of the first round in all leagues.

Ryan Grant, GB

Bye: 10

A strong finish to the 2009 season gave Packers RB Ryan Grant some really nice numbers. Grant ended the year with 1,253 yards on 282 carries (4.4 avg.) and 11 rushing touchdowns. He also had a career-high 197 yards receiving on 25 catches. Six of his 11 scores came in the final four weeks of the regular season, really providing a boost to Fantasy owners who grabbed him for the Fantasy postseason run. Grant had only three games with over 100 yards rushing but totaled over 100 yards seven times and only produced three weeks without 100 total yards or a touchdown (against the Vikings, Cowboys and Ravens, very good run defenses). We like Grant a lot headed into 2010 because the Packers' offense is awesome, his offensive line is only going to get better and there are no indications out of Green Bay that he'll give any of his workload to another running back. With another year of 300 touches expected and Grant a stable Fantasy rusher for three years now, he's an easy choice as a No. 1 Fantasy rusher worth a pick in Round 2 in all leagues this season.

Shonn Greene, NYJ

Bye: 7

Shonn Greene endeared himself to Fantasy owners with a strong playoff run in 2009, and he also endeared himself to his coaches. After helping carry the Jets to the AFC Championship Game with 54 carries for 304 yards and two touchdowns in three playoff games, the team seemingly handed him the primary rushing job after they released Thomas Jones. But that changed once the Jets signed LaDainian Tomlinson, and Greene now has company in the backfield -- including Joe McKnight, who was drafted in Round 4 of the NFL Draft. We expect Greene to land around 15 touches per game with goal-line duties. He will lose carries to Tomlinson and McKnight, and the Jets might throw a smidge more than last season with the offseason addition of Santonio Holmes, but Greene should still have the chance to shine, especially behind this talented offensive line. We like Greene as a No. 2 Fantasy RB worth a pick in Round 3 or Round 4 in all leagues. We expect big things from Greene in his second year in the NFL.

Montario Hardesty, CLE

Bye: 8

The Browns traded back into Round 2 to select Tennessee RB Montario Hardesty, and speculation is already rampant that he'll vie for the starting job and the lion's share of the carries with Jerome Harrison this summer. Hardesty overcame multiple injuries in college including a torn ACL in 2006 and a stress fracture in 2008 to finish his career as a Volunteer with 1,308 rushing yards as a senior. Though Hardesty's injury-plagued past is an obvious concern, the upside this Jamal Lewis-clone brings as the Browns' potential running downs back and goal-line fixture will draw plenty of attention. He's a mid-round pick to target as a No. 3 RB candidate, about the same spot Harrison should go in drafts.

Jerome Harrison, CLE

Jerome Harrison has seen the Browns add two running backs to the team this offseason while getting passed over as a restricted free agent. That's not what many Fantasy owners anticipated following his incredible three-game explosion to end 2009. Save for a Week 4 explosion against the Bengals, Harrison was a non-factor last season until posting the third-best rushing total in a single game in Week 15 against the Chiefs with 286 yards. He followed that up with 148 yards against the Raiders and then finished the year with 127 yards against the Jaguars, scoring at least one time and putting up at least 33 carries in each of those games. Harrison had 561 of his 862 rushing yards and five of his seven total touchdowns in those last three contests. But with rookie Montario Hardesty and third-year rusher Peyton Hillis now part of the running backs corps -- a trio that will share the ball according to head coach Eric Mangini -- Harrison's opportunities will be limited. He's now worth taking with a mid-round pick as nothing better than a top-end No. 3 Fantasy RB, right around the same status we view Hardesty as. Be careful not to overvalue Harrison in Fantasy drafts this summer.

Tim Hightower, ARI

Tim Hightower is expected to split reps in Arizona with Beanie Wells, playing a prominent role for the Cardinals. In two years, Hightower has 18 touchdowns and he seems to find ways to produce even when his touches are limited (only 143 carries in each of his two years in the NFL). He's also a proven receiver out of the backfield with 63 catches for 428 yards last year, and his main role this season will likely be on third downs and in short-yardage/goal-line situations while Wells handles the majority of duties on running downs. Hightower might not be the hottest name in the world but he is worth a middle-round pick in all leagues and can go higher in PPR formats thanks to his touchdown potential. The addition of left guard Alan Faneca in late April will help his cause, and Hightower also could be motivated since he's entering a potential contract year. And it's not a bad idea to consider Hightower as a handcuff option for Wells, though that would mean spending two of your first seven, eight or nine picks on two rushers for the same team.

Peyton Hillis joins the Browns after he was traded from Denver in the offseason as part of the Brady Quinn deal. The expectation is that the Browns will utilize Hillis for his good receiving skills and inside running ability, though with the addition of Montario Hardesty along with Jerome Harrison combining to maintain the majority of the rushing duties, Hillis might land about five touches on average per week. Until he finds relevant playing time, you can pass on keeping Hillis on your roster this season.

Jackson underwhelmed to the point that the Packers brought back veteran rusher Ahman Green to help Ryan Grant with the workload down the stretch. Jackson

Fred Jackson, BUF

Fred Jackson is expected to serve as the Bills' primary running back this season, but a broken hand suffered in the preseason could force him out for a game or two to start the year. Jackson was a bright spot for the Bills offense in 2009, leading the team in rushing with 237 carries for 1,062 yards (4.5 avg.) with two touchdowns. He was also second on the team in receptions with 46, adding 371 yards and two touchdowns with two lost fumbles. But with the hand injury sidelining him for much of August, and with rookie C.J. Spiller another player to share the ball with, Jackson might best be considered a guy to target with a middle- to late-round pick and sit on until he's in game shape and his hand is healed.

Steven Jackson, STL

Steven Jackson is expecting big things for himself this season. In an interview with CBSsports.com in February, Jackson said "I believe that stat-wise I will have my most impressive season that I've ever had, including 2006." To refresh your memory, Jackson had more than 2,300 total yards and 16 touchdowns that season. Jackson also is coming off a great year in 2009 with more than 1,700 total yards and four touchdowns, and he's clearly the best player for the Rams. Unfortunately, opposing defenses know that as well, which is why Jackson has a big target on his back. And that back happens to be a troubled area for Jackson -- he had surgery on it in April to relieve a herniated disc. We expect him to be ready for camp, and we like Jackson as a No. 1 Fantasy RB. He's worth a pick toward the end of Round 1 or beginning of Round 2 on Draft Day.

Brandon Jacobs, NYG

Brandon Jacobs is expected to be fine after offseason knee surgery, but he has a lot to prove to Fantasy owners this year. Jacobs was a huge disappointment in 2009 with 224 carries for 835 yards (3.7 yards per carry) and five touchdowns. He snapped a two-year streak of rushing for at least 1,000 yards and had his lowest rushing average since his rookie season in 2005. Jacobs has the potential for a rebound year since he'll only be 28, and the Giants will look to keep him fresh in tandem with Ahmad Bradshaw. Jacobs is still the workhorse of this backfield, and he also is the goal-line back, so that should give him the chance to run for 1,000 yards and reach double digits in touchdowns. But based on what we saw last year from Jacobs (and Bradshaw), and with the Giants possibly becoming a passing team with all their talent at wide receiver, Jacobs should now be considered a No. 3 Fantasy RB. Don't reach for Jacobs until Round 5 at the earliest since he's no lock to see a ton of work or stay healthy for the course of the year.

Chris Jennings, CLE

Bye: 8

Chris Jennings will look to play a role for the Browns' RB corps this season. But the Browns' RB corps was such a mess last season that following a 20-carry, 73-yard, one-touchdown performance against the Steelers in Week 14 it was believed that Jennings was the team's back of the future. But the following week Jennings saw teammate Jerome Harrison rip up the Chiefs for an all-time, third-best 286 yards rushing. Jennings wound up with 220 yards rushing with the one score and another 56 yards receiving. He'll battle for a spot along the Browns' RB depth chart this summer behind Harrison with James Davis, but he's not expected to produce significant stats. He's nothing more than a late-round flier in the deepest of leagues.

Rashad Jennings, JAC

Bye: 9

Rashad Jennings will likely battle 2010 rookie RB Deji Karim to back up Maurice Jones-Drew in the Jaguars' backfield. Last year Jennings played sparingly with 202 yards on 39 carries (5.2 avg.) with one touchdown. He also caught 16 balls for 101 yards. He'll get a couple of touches each week but serves Fantasy owners as nothing more than an insurance policy for those who take Jones-Drew with an early-round pick -- assuming he beats out Karim. Consider him late in drafts, if at all.

Chris Johnson, TEN

Bye: 9

By the time you finish reading this sentence, Chris Johnson could have ran for a 99-yard touchdown. He's a fast man, and it's that blazing speed that makes him a statistical dream come true for Fantasy owners. You know his stats from last year: 2,006 rush yards, 503 receiving yards, a sick 5.6 rushing average over 358 carries and 16 total touchdowns with just three fumbles lost. Can he match those numbers again in 2010? It will be difficult: The five previous running backs to rush for 2,000 yards have fallen off the following season (Eric Dickerson, Jamal Lewis, Barry Sanders, Terrell Davis and O.J. Simpson). But Johnson, who will turn 25 years old just after the start of the season, has youth on his side along with a coaching staff that will lean on him so long as he stays productive and a tremendous offensive line. With at least 100 total yards in all but three games last season and an 11-game streak of 100-yard rushing performances still active, you can expect him to start and get close to 20 touches a game. In Fantasy Football these days, you should take that all day from a running back. Johnson is well worth taking as the No. 1 overall pick in all Fantasy drafts this summer.

Larry Johnson, WAS

Bye: 9

Larry Johnson is trying to resurrect his career with the Redskins this season after he was signed to a three-year deal in March. Johnson, 30, will likely be the No. 2 RB in Washington behind starter Clinton Portis, although Johnson could push Portis for the starter's role in training camp. Johnson himself will be pushed for the No. 2 spot by Willie Parker, who is also in the mix in Washington. Johnson had a disappointing season in 2009 after struggling to start the year in Kansas City and then not doing much once he joined the Bengals. While Johnson could do well under new Redskins coach Mike Shanahan -- he has coached 11 individual 1,000-yard rushing seasons in Denver from 1995-2008 -- Portis is still expected to get the majority of touches. We're not worried about Parker taking reps from Johnson, but keep in mind that the reps will be limited all the way around in Washington. Based on that, Johnson's age and rapid decline in production, he should only be viewed as a late-round pick on Draft Day.

Felix Jones, DAL

Bye: 4

Felix Jones could be in line for a big season if he can stay healthy and prove to the Cowboys he's ready to share the load with Marion Barber. Jones played well last season, including the playoffs, when he led Dallas with 217 rushing yards and a touchdown and 52 receiving yards in two postseason games. For the season, Jones had 685 rushing yards and three touchdowns and 19 catches for 119 yards, but he was marred by injuries for the second year in a row. Barber continues to struggle with poor production and injuries also, so Jones could see a bigger role in the offense, including as a receiver. Tashard Choice will also get his share of carries, but Jones should be considered a sleeper because of his high yardage potential and his fabulous offseason which included him adding muscle and improving his receiving skills. He is worth drafting as a low-end No. 2/top-end No. 3 Fantasy RB with a pick between Rounds 6 and 8, but don't be surprised if he ends up starting for you for several weeks in the season. We like Jones' upside this year.

Julius Jones, SEA

Bye: 5

Julius Jones will likely share carries with Justin Forsett and Leon Washington this year. Forsett is the likely starter with Washington expected to see time on passing downs, but Jones should be the No. 3 RB this season. He isn't going to be a big factor for the Seahawks this year, but Jones is worth drafting with a late-round pick in deeper leagues.

Thomas Jones, KC

Bye: 4

Thomas Jones has signed with Kansas City this offseason, agreeing to a two-year deal worth $5 million. Jones, who will be 32 when the season starts, is expected to share carries with Jamaal Charles. We see the team using both running backs as an even split, but Jones will likely get the short-yardage and goal-line carries based on his bigger body compared to Charles. Last year, Jones had a career year with 331 carries for 1,402 yards (4.2 yards per carry) and 14 rushing touchdowns. He also added 10 catches for 58 yards. But he has started to reach the benchmarks we use to determine when a running back might break down, and so we're hesitant to consider him anything more than a No. 3 Fantasy RB heading into 2010. His value could improve based on his role with the Chiefs, but remember Charles is a talented RB and the future in Kansas City. The Chiefs also drafted WR Dexter McCluster, who could see some carries out of the backfield. And the Chiefs offensive line is far what Jones ran behind in New York. That lowers the value for Jones heading into this season, and it's why you should draft him with a mid-round pick at the earliest in all leagues.

Maurice Jones-Drew, JAC

Bye: 9

Looking for sure things? You've come to the right place as Maurice Jones-Drew has been a Fantasy sensation over his entire career. Landing the starter's role in 2009 – and the carries that come with it – MJD totaled 1,391 yards on a whopping 312 carries (4.5 avg.) with 15 touchdowns, adding 374 receiving yards on 53 catches with another score. And over his 365 touches, Jones-Drew fumbled the ball away once. Jones-Drew has a consistent track record (over 1,100 total yards and at least nine total touchdowns in every season) and has never missed a game due to injury. There aren't many Fantasy running backs as consistent as Jones-Drew, making him a no-brainer No. 1 Fantasy RB well worth a Top-5 overall pick in standard formats and a potential No. 1 overall pick in leagues where receptions count.

Brian Leonard, CIN

Bye: 6

Brian Leonard has a chance to continue his role with the Bengals this season. But his contributions to the Bengals in 2009 were larger to the team than they were to Fantasy owners. Never scoring more than three points per week in standard formats, Leonard amassed 84 rush yards and 217 receiving yards on 30 grabs. He's expected to retain his third-down role with the Bengals in 2010, so don't expect a huge uptick in stats.

Marshawn Lynch, BUF

Bye: 6

Marshawn Lynch will try to get his career back on track after a disappointing 2009 season, but he has plenty of company in the backfield in Buffalo. Last year, Lynch was suspended for the first three games of the season after violating the NFL's personal conduct policy. He never seemed to get going when he returned in Week 4 and was outplayed by teammate Fred Jackson. In his first two seasons, Lynch ran for 2,151 yards and 15 touchdowns and had 65 catches for 484 yards and a touchdown. He will look to regain that form this year, but he almost certainly will share carries with Jackson and rookie RB C.J. Spiller. New coach Chan Gailey will have to figure out how to use all three running backs, and a sprained ankle suffered by Lynch in the team's first preseason game doesn't help his cause. We think Jackson has more value than Lynch, but Lynch could regain his pre-2009 form with Spiller working more as a receiver and in the return game. Consider Lynch a reserve RB worth a late-round pick and keep an eye on how he's used during training camp to see if he remains a prominent part of the backfield rotation. He could end up being a steal if you draft him in the later rounds.

Laurence Maroney, NE

Bye: 5

Laurence Maroney had a resurgent year with the Patriots in 2009. After missing most of the 2008 season with a shoulder injury, Maroney came back with 194 carries for 757 yards (3.9 yards per carry) and nine touchdowns with 14 catches for 99 yards. But he also lost four fumbles. There was a time in 2009 when Maroney was among the best Fantasy running backs with seven games with double figures in Fantasy points in nine games. He will enter this season in a contract year, but he will likely compete for carries again on a weekly basis with the rest of the Patriots' running backs. But Maroney showed he is worth a mid-round pick as at least a No. 3 Fantasy RB based on how he played last season. If Bill Belichick continues to show faith in Maroney, then he can have plenty of value in all leagues.

Ryan Mathews, SD

Bye: 10

The Chargers moved up in the NFL Draft to take RB Ryan Mathews from Fresno State at No. 12 overall, and he's considered the successor to LaDainian Tomlinson, who was released in February. Mathews, the nation's leading rusher at 150.7 yards per game in college, a 218-pounder who scored 19 touchdowns last season, will share carries with Darren Sproles, but Sproles is better suited as a change-of-pace RB and receiver out of the backfield. Mathews will get goal-line work and should be considered a low-end No. 2 Fantasy RB worth a mid-round pick in seasonal leagues. In rookie-only drafts, Mathews is worth a first-round pick, and he should be drafted high in keeper formats as well.

Bye: 8

LeSean McCoy will be the starter for the Eagles this season with Brian Westbrook no longer with the team after he was released. McCoy played well as a rookie in 2009 with 637 rushing yards and four touchdowns and 40 catches for 308 yards. McCoy showed he could handle the starting job last year with four games with double digits in Fantasy points in the first five games after Westbrook first got hurt. McCoy should be considered a solid No. 2 Fantasy RB worth a pick beginning at the end of Round 2 or beginning of Round 3. There is some downside to McCoy since Mike Bell was added to the roster, and Leonard Weaver will also get carries. But McCoy will get the majority of touches for the Eagles and has plenty of upside this season.

Darren McFadden, OAK

Bye: 10

Darren McFadden will enter his third year in the NFL trying to live up to lofty expectations. In his first two years, McFadden was hindered by injuries and inconsistent play. He took a step back in 2009 as his production decreased in every statistical category. He only appeared in 12 games due to a knee injury and finished with 104 carries for 357 yards (3.4 yards per carry) and one touchdown and caught 21 passes for 245 yards with three lost fumbles. McFadden is expected to split reps with teammate Michael Bush this season after the release of veteran Justin Fargas, but owners can't be excited about the former Arkansas Razorback after two years of disappointing play. We consider him a No. 3 Fantasy RB worth a pick between Rounds 7 and 8. Hopefully this is the year he can stay healthy and dominate, but don't reach for him with a high draft pick anymore. Let him fall to you in the middle of your draft and wait to see if this can be his breakout year.

Willis McGahee, BAL

Bye: 8

Willis McGahee put concerns about his production to rest in 2009 when he emerged as a goal-line stud for the Ravens. He led the team with 12 rushing touchdowns and kicked in two receiving touchdowns to boot, carrying him to Top-24 Fantasy RB status in standard formats. He also caught 15 passes for 85 yards and rushed for 544 yards on 109 carries (an improbable career-best 5.0 avg.), though he only topped 10 carries in six games and 50 rushing yards in five games because Ray Rice was the primary rusher. There was some concern that his 2009 salary of $3.6 million would cost him a roster spot with the Ravens, but the team is reportedly willing to pay it to keep him in the offense. He's obviously a fantastic insurance policy for those owners who spend their top pick on Rice, but he's also worth a look as a solid reserve and one-week replacement during the year for your other starters. Expect McGahee to be picked with a middle- to late-round pick but potentially deliver beyond others taken in that area.

Rashard Mendenhall, PIT

Bye: 5

Fantasy owners are looking for Rashard Mendenhall to keep thrashing opponents just as he did last season. After getting benched for poor practice habits, Mendenhall was fired up and steamrolled the Chargers for 165 yards and two touchdowns. He never looked back as he totaled 1,108 yards on 242 carries (4.6 avg.) with seven scores, adding 25 receptions for 261 yards (10.4 avg.) with another score. From Week 4 through the end of the season, Mendenhall totaled 100 yards and/or scored in 10 of 12 games, an incredible feat. There's a lot to like here as Mendenhall doesn't have much competition for playing time at this point and has only 261 career carries. He could also be asked to carry the ball more to start the season with Ben Roethlisberger suspended for the first six games for violating the NFL's personal conduct policy. The addition of another back to help him with the workload is also a floating concern. But heading into the season Mendenhall should be viewed as a No. 1 Fantasy rusher worth a pick among the Top 15 overall selections.

Ryan Moats was expected to battle for the third-string RB spot in Minnesota behind Adrian Peterson and Toby Gerhart, but he clearly wasn't impressing enough in camp to stick around once a roster spot was needed and the Vikings released him in mid-August. Moats is likely to end up on another NFL squad, maybe even back with his former Houston teammates, but unless he somehow stumbles into getting more touches than expected, he will remain pretty much a non-factor in Fantasy play heading into 2010.

Mewelde Moore is expected to resume his role as the third-down back for the Steelers in 2010. He might see an uptick in work with Willie Parker gone in Pittsburgh, though the team could always add another back. Moore's numbers were a bit disappointing last season (118 rush yards, 153 receiving yards, two touchdowns), but expectations weren't that high for him anyway. Even though he's in a contract year, he's nothing more than a low-end one-week replacement option for owners to check out in PPR formats.

Knowshon Moreno, DEN

Bye: 9

Knowshon Moreno should take on more of a workload in his sophomore season after he had a standout rookie campaign -- if an early training camp hamstring injury doesn't derail his season first. He didn't rush for 100 yards in any game in 2009, but he did have double digits in Fantasy points in five games while gaining 947 rushing yards on 247 carries (3.8 yards per carry) and five touchdowns. He also added 28 catches for 213 yards and two touchdowns with four lost fumbles. Moreno won't have to worry about sharing carries in 2010 the way he did last year with Correll Buckhalter since he will be the No. 1 option in Denver, but without Brandon Marshall to thin the safeties from the line of scrimmage, the going could get tougher for Moreno. Injuries, like the hamstring ailment that hurt him on the first day of training camp, won't help his plight either. We like him as a good No. 2 Fantasy RB worth drafting between late Round 2 and late Round 3 in all leagues.

Maurice Morris, DET

Bye: 7

Lions RB Maurice Morris is expected to serve in a reserve role this season following the drafting of RB Jahvid Best in April's draft. When last year's starter, Kevin Smith, was out late in the year, Morris did his best to replace him. In three starts to end the season Morris had 51 carries for 228 yards and a score with 14 catches for 105 yards. No surprise, it's that late-season push that made Morris' 2009 totals decent as he ended up with 384 yards with two scores and 26 catches for 210 yards. Morris won't see much playing time in Detroit now that he's behind two backs on paper, so keep him out of your Fantasy plans. If he regains some regular reps, he'd be a consideration as a one-week replacement option.

Sammy Morris, NE

Bye: 5

Patriots offensive lineman Matt Light said in an interview with CBSsports.com in February that he thought Sammy Morris was the best running back in New England. He wasn't overlooking the rest of the Patriots' running backs, but Light said Morris had the ability to do it all as a runner, receiver and blocker. The biggest problem for Morris is staying healthy. He missed four games and part of others with various ailments, and he hasn't played a full season since 2005. Morris will be 33 this season and in a contract year, but he will again share carries with the aforementioned running backs. He's still capable of producing quality stats -- he had 73 carries for 319 yards and two touchdowns and caught 19 passes for 180 yards with two fumbles last year -- but it depends on his health and amount of touches. We view Morris as a No. 4 Fantasy RB worth a late-round pick in all leagues.

Jerious Norwood, ATL

Bye: 8

Jerious Norwood's future is up in the air after his worst season statistically, gaining 252 yards on 76 carries (a hideous 3.3 yards per rush, nearly two yards shy of his previous career-low) with 19 catches for 186 yards (9.8 avg.) and one receiving touchdown. A right hip flexor injury robbed him of six games during the season, but he was equally ineffective before the injury and after. Norwood is a restricted free agent this offseason, so there's a chance he could switch teams, but he's pegged into a third-down role and doesn't seem like a candidate to have even 15 touches a game on a regular basis. Don't count on Norwood as anything more than a low-end Fantasy reserve in 2010, and that's the case even if he stays in Atlanta.

Willie Parker, WAS

Bye: 9

Willie Parker signed with the Redskins in early April and will attempt to land some playing time alongside (or behind) Clinton Portis and Larry Johnson this summer. Parker got hurt early in 2009 with the Steelers and played Wally Pipp to Rashard Mendenhall's Lou Gehrig, losing his grip on his playing time. He finished with 389 yards on 98 carries (4.0 avg.) with no rushing touchdowns though he did score through the air once (six catches for 64 yards). Injuries have really hampered Parker, who will be 29 when the season starts but came into the league when he was 25 so he doesn't have the "mileage" a running back at 29 typically has. We suspect that Parker will land a limited role with Washington and ultimately be nothing more than a reserve option possibly worth a late-round pick in drafts.

Adrian Peterson, MIN

Bye: 4

There's no denying that Adrian Peterson is still one of the best running backs in Fantasy Football, but he's no longer the consensus top pick. Topping 300 carries for the second season in a row, Peterson racked up 1,383 yards on 314 carries (4.4 avg.) with 18 touchdowns. He also set career-bests with 43 catches for 436 yards (10.1 avg.). His 357 total touches is still off what he had last year, but wear and tear on Peterson could become a problem, combined with an alarming fumbling problem. Peterson had six fumbles lost during the regular season and also coughed up the ball twice more in the postseason, though the Vikings recovered those fumbles. While Peterson's fumble potential is a strike against him, Peterson's touchdown totals and his overall ability make him a no-doubt No. 1 Fantasy rusher heading into the summer and a Top 3 overall pick. He's still among the best players at his position.

Clinton Portis, WAS

Bye: 9

Clinton Portis is hoping for a big season in 2010 now that he is being reunited with former coach Mike Shanahan, but he's unlikely to see as much work now as he did in his first go-round with Shanahan. When both were in Denver in 2002-03 before Portis was traded to Washington, Portis had 1,500 rushing yards in each season with 29 touchdowns. But he was a ball hog then as the Broncos couldn't get enough of his productivity; now he'll have to fend off Larry Johnson and Willie Parker, the Redskins' offseason additions, for reps. Portis, who will be 28 when the season starts, is coming off an injury-riddled year in 2009 (he only played in eight games due to a concussion) and was limited to a career-low 494 rushing yards and one touchdown. Portis now has some sleeper potential since he will fall in drafts due to his perceived lack of youth, but he still has the upside to be a solid No. 2 Fantasy RB. Johnson and Parker are expected to eat into his playing time, and Portis isn't entirely the RB he was in Denver, but Shanahan's influence and track record with running backs is relevant since he has coached 11 individual 1,000-yards rushing seasons in Denver from 1995-2008. If Portis can stay healthy then he should post quality stats (he had at least 1,500 total yards and 20 touchdowns in 2007-08), and he's worth drafting beginning in Round 3 and as late as Round 4 this season.

Ray Rice, BAL

Bye: 8

Ray Rice told CBSsports.com after the season that his goal for 2009 was to prove that he belonged in the NFL. Did he ever – Rice totaled 1,339 rushing yards on 254 carries (5.3 avg.) with seven touchdowns and 702 yards receiving on 78 catches (9.0 avg.) and another score. That's a total of 2,041 yards on 332 touches, and he had just three fumbles lost. He added two more touchdowns in the postseason with 226 rushing yards and 60 receiving yards. Considering that he shared the ball with Willis McGahee for much of the season, especially inside the 5-yard line, Rice's totals are outstanding. The Ravens are expected to continue splitting reps between Rice and McGahee, and many owners are concerned that an improved receiving corps could take receiving totals away from Rice, but the reality is that the rusher is the only guy on the team with 20-touch potential from week to week. He's a cinch as a No. 1 Fantasy RB likely going somewhere between fourth and sixth overall in all leagues this summer.

Javon Ringer, TEN

Bye: 9

Titans RB Javon Ringer didn't get much work as a rookie in 2009, but that could start to change in 2010. After being inactive for more games (nine) than carries given when active (eight), Ringer could push for the primary backup job behind Chris Johnson in camp this summer. If it happens, Ringer would be a reliable insurance policy for those owners who take Johnson with a first-round pick. Consider him late in deeper drafts.

Bernard Scott, CIN

Bye: 6

Bernard Scott is looking to build off his rookie year in 2010. Scott saw action in three games last season in place of Bengals starting RB Cedric Benson and did well when given the reps. Otherwise, his reps were minimal, and he didn't have much time with the ball other than on special teams. He totaled 321 yards on 74 carries (4.3 avg.) with 67 more yards on five catches. But he dazzled on kickoffs, averaging 31.5 yards over 16 returns with a touchdown. Scott's role in 2010 will be as a backup to Benson. Think late-round pick on Scott if you draft Benson since Scott proved he's a solid handcuff option in case Benson gets hurt.

Steve Slaton, HOU

Steve Slaton has a chance to be a fairly reliable Fantasy reserve running back this season. Though he's no lock to land the starting job or even earn the lion's share of playing time, Slaton should work as at least a third-down back and in other passing situations. A season-ending injury to rookie RB Ben Tate also should open the door for Slaton to put in a little more work, though Arian Foster is expected to start and hold Slaton back some. He was a good receiver out of the backfield in 2009, nailing down 44 catches for 417 yards and four touchdowns, and that's something he should continue to do in 2010 provided that he's healthy. Plan on drafting Slaton with a middle- to late-round pick, and he should still be considered a reserve Fantasy RB. In leagues where receptions count, Slaton's value is higher since that's the role he'll play in Houston this year.

Kevin Smith, DET

The 2009 season was not kind to Lions second-year RB Kevin Smith. After struggling to post meaningful stats from week to week, Smith tore a knee ligament in Week 14 and was placed on injured reserve. But he has worked hard this offseason to rehab his knee and he started training camp on-time and not on the PUP list. But he has company in the backfield with rookie Jahvid Best, who the Lions drafted with a first-round pick. A promising rookie in 2008, Smith totaled 747 yards on 217 carries (3.4 avg.) with four rushing touchdowns in 2009, adding 415 yards on 41 catches and a score. All signs point to Best and Smith working in tandem this season, effectively limiting both backs. Best has more upside because he's healthier and should play a little bit more. Smith is a nice reserve option, but that's about it. Consider him with a late-round pick.

Jason Snelling, ATL Bye: 8

Jason Snelling had been on our radar since his rookie season, but it took him until 2009 to break out. It will be difficult for him to keep it going in 2010. Seeing lots of playing time in place of Michael Turner in the second half of last season, Snelling finished with 613 rush yards on 142 carries (4.3 avg.) and four touchdowns. He also caught a stunning 30 passes for 259 yards (8.6 avg.) with another score. And he lost only one fumble on the season. Snelling was productive when given the chance, but with Turner coming back healthy for 2010 it's not expected that he'll stay in a prominent role. He's a no-brainer insurance policy for those owners who take Turner with a first-round pick. Think of Snelling as a late-round option at this point.

C.J. Spiller, BUF

The Bills swiped RB C.J. Spiller with their top pick in April's draft, and all signs point to him working in a versatile role ala Reggie Bush. That should yield a decent amount of work each week, but not the kind of cumulative touches you'd expect from your typical running back. There's no doubt he's talented: He's one of two players in college football history with 3,000 rushing yards, 1,500 kickoff-return yards, 1,000 receiving yards, and 500 punt-return yards (Reggie Bush). Last year he paced Clemson with 1,212 yards and twelve scores on 216 carries (5.61 avg.), adding 503 yards with four touchdowns on 36 catches. But with a terrible offense around him, he's going to attract plenty of defensive attention. We like Ryan Mathews of the Chargers better as far as rookies go. We consider Spiller a No. 3 Fantasy RB who might get picked earlier than he should be just because of what he did in college and on highlight reels. We wouldn't touch him until at least Round 6 and possibly as late as Round 8.

Darren Sproles, SD

Darren Sproles is back with the Chargers this season after signing a $7 million-plus deal for 2010 as a restricted free agent. But he has a new backfield mate with the Chargers drafting Ryan Mathews at No. 12 overall in the NFL Draft. Sproles has had few chances to show he can handle carrying the ball on first and second down on a full-time basis (two career games with 20-plus touches). He's not built to be a bruising running back at 5-foot-8, 185 pounds, but he has elusive speed, which the Chargers love. That should result in an increase in playing time, but not enough to make him a dangerous Fantasy option. We like Sproles as a low-end No. 3 Fantasy RB, higher in leagues where receptions count. He's worth a pick as early as Round 8, and he should do well sharing carries with Mathews.

Jonathan Stewart, CAR

Jonathan Stewart should be healthy and ready for training camp after having offseason surgery on his foot, which will hopefully correct all the nagging injuries that plagued him during 2009. Expect him to be a candidate for 1,000 total yards and seven touchdowns this season, good enough to make him a middle- to low-end No. 2 Fantasy RB worth a pick between Rounds 5 and 7 in drafts even though he will be sharing carries with DeAngelo Williams once again. Achilles' and toe injuries limited Stewart in practice every week in 2009, but you wouldn't know it by his final numbers. Stewart ended the season with the best rushing totals on the Panthers, gaining 1,133 yards on 221 carries (5.1 avg.) with 10 rushing touchdowns, adding a score through the air with 18 catches for 139 yards (7.7 avg.) and a pair of fumbles lost. Stewart seemed to run hot one week, cold the next and we attributed it to his nagging injuries. But in his final five games – four of which featured him as the starting running back with Williams injured – Stewart racked up 589 yards and five total scores. That's the upside Stewart can bring the Panthers if he ever was able to see 20 touches per game on a weekly basis. But with the reality that Williams will be healthy and back to seeing the lion's share of carries for the Panthers in 2010, Stewart's upside won't be seen as much. Still, you see what he's capable of doing when Williams is out, and we like that kind of upside.

Ben Tate, HOU

The Texans took Auburn RB Ben Tate with the 58th overall pick in the NFL draft, moving up in Round 2 to get him. But Tate suffered a "very significant" ankle injury on his second preseason carry and was placed on injured reserve. Tate should be a candidate to factor into the Texans' run game next year when he gets healthy, but he won't help you this year. Ignore him in seasonal leagues but target him with a middle- to late-round pick in dynasty/keeper leagues and with an early- to middle-round pick in rookie-only drafts.

Chester Taylor, CHI

In 2006, Chester Taylor came to the Vikings as a free agent and totaled just over 1,500 yards with six touchdowns as their starting running back. He hopes to come closer to those totals in 2010 with his third team – the Bears – after signing with them in March. Taylor was all right as the secondary running back behind Adrian Peterson, getting 338 yards on 94 carries (3.6 avg.) with a touchdown, adding more as a receiver with 389 yards and a score on 44 catches (8.8 avg.). While he'll be 31 years old just after the start of the 2010 season, he should still have enough gas in the tank to be an effective part-time rusher, which is what the Bears envision seeing as how he has "Marshall Faulk skills" and will work for offensive coordinator Mike Martz. Taylor should see a bump in production and settles in as a decent No. 3 Fantasy RB this season, worth a pick between Rounds 7 and 8. He's got plenty of potential to turn in another solid campaign, but then again, so does the back he'll share reps with: Matt Forte.

Fred Taylor, NE

Fred Taylor didn't make the splash he was hoping for in his first season with the Patriots in 2009. He only appeared in six games due to an ankle injury, but he was productive when he was on the field. Taylor had 63 carries for 269 yards (4.3 yards per carry) and four touchdowns with two catches for 17 yards and a lost fumble. He will return this season at 34 and in a contract year and will again be part of a rotation with the rest of the Patriots' running backs. Taylor isn't worth drafting in the majority of Fantasy leagues, but he could be worth adding off the waiver wire if he gets enough carries during the year and can string together some productive games.

Pierre Thomas, NO

Saints RB Pierre Thomas didn't live up to expectations set before the 2009 season, but he didn't completely disappoint. Now the door is open for him to be a quality rusher in 2010. Effectively playing in only 13 games, Thomas totaled 793 yards on 147 carries (5.4 avg.) with six touchdowns on the ground. Through the air, Thomas caught a career-best 39 passes for 302 yards (7.7 avg.) and two more touchdowns. Thomas also had a rushing touchdown, two receiving touchdowns, 143 rushing yards and 111 receiving yards in three postseason games. And he lost just one fumble all year. Speaking before the Super Bowl, Thomas told CBSsports.com that while he likes to share the ball, he's also aware that the Saints are "going to bring someone in next year to compete, and I've got to go out there and do what I have to do to stay on this team." Reggie Bush certainly takes touches away, but he's a unique kind of RB, not a traditional back like Thomas. The biggest competition for work was Lynell Hamilton, but he tore his ACL in mid-August and is lost for the season. Thomas could be in line for a lot of reps, including at the goal line, making him a very solid No. 2 Fantasy RB. You'll be able to draft Thomas between Rounds 3 and 4.

LaDainian Tomlinson, NYJ

LaDainian Tomlinson will start a new chapter in his career this season now that he's playing for the New York Jets. Tomlinson, 31, was released by the Chargers in February, but now he goes to a team with arguably the best offensive line in the NFL even with the loss of guard Alan Faneca. He has plenty of company in the backfield with Shonn Greene and rookie Joe McKnight, but Tomlinson will see his share of touches. He will replace the departed Thomas Jones, who signed with Kansas City after running for a career-high 1,402 yards and 14 touchdowns. Tomlinson ran for 730 yards - his first season under 1,000 - on 223 carries for an average of 3.3 yards per carry, all career lows. He scored 12 touchdowns, continuing his streak of double digits in touchdowns every year of his career, but his role was reduced. We see Tomlinson as a low-end No. 2/high-end No. 3 Fantasy RB coming into the season worth a mid-round pick. He's not an elite Fantasy option anymore, but playing behind this offensive line gives him enough potential to still post quality stats even at his age and coming off a disappointing year.

Michael Turner, ATL

Michael Turner is ready for a rebound season. He was well on his way to having an amazing 2009 when he suffered a high-ankle sprain that he never properly recovered from, disappointing Fantasy owners during the late-season run. His stats were still really good: A season after tallying 394 rushes (including the postseason), Turner put up 871 yards on 178 carries (4.9 avg.) with 10 touchdowns. He also caught five passes for 35 yards and lost two fumbles. He averaged 5.03 yards per carry from Weeks 1 through 10 and had a touchdown and/or 100 rush yards in every game except the season opener before getting hurt. That's what we're looking for from him in 2010. It's possible that the Falcons will try to cut down on his carries, but even if he gets around 250 reps on the season he should be productive. Behind a solid O-line and with a capable passing offense, the sky is the limit for Turner. That's what makes him appealing as a Top-5 Fantasy RB in standard formats, well worth an early first-round pick anywhere from third to sixth overall.

Derrick Ward, TB

Derrick Ward was a horrible disappointment in 2009 after being a consistent No. 3 Fantasy RB in 2008 and needs to rebound in 2010. Signed by the Bucs, Ward wound up splitting reps in nearly every game for Tampa Bay last year. He finished with just 409 yards on 114 carries (a lowly 3.6 avg.) with one score on the ground. He also had 150 yards and two touchdowns on 20 catches. But the most disappointing stat was that he only topped 10 total touches in half of his games. Ward will remain in the backfield mix this season but enters the offseason decidedly behind Cadillac Williams on the depth chart. He's no better than a late-round pick in drafts this summer as a reserve RB.

Leon Washington, SEA

Bye: 5

Leon Washington was traded from the Jets to the Seahawks in April and is expected to be ready for training camp after breaking his leg last October. He's likely to earn a similar role to what we saw from him with the Jets so long as he's healthy. Washington is expected to share carries with Justin Forsett and Julius Jones, so while he's capable of being a solid Fantasy contributor, which he showed in 2008 when he had 448 rushing yards and six touchdowns and 47 catches for 355 yards and two more touchdowns, he's probably not going to see many opportunities. Washington will be worth drafting with a late-round pick based on his ability to catch the ball, but he's no more than a Fantasy reserve in the majority of formats. He has slightly more value in leagues where receptions count based on how we anticipate he'll be used -- as long as he's 100 percent recovered from the leg injury.

Leonard Weaver is the starting FB for the Eagles, but he touches the ball more than the average blocker. In 2009, his first year in Philadelphia, Weaver had a career-high 323 yards rushing, 140 yards receiving and four touchdowns. He is expected to share the ball this season with LeSean McCoy and Mike Bell, but Weaver is clearly the No. 3 option and will likely lose goal-line touches to Bell. Weaver isn't worth drafting in the majority of leagues, but he should definitely be taken with a late-round pick in leagues where you start a FB.

Beanie Wells, ARI

Bye: 6

Are the Cardinals poised to become a running team in 2010? Beanie Wells hopes so entering his sophomore season. Kurt Warner retired following the 2009 season, and the Cardinals also traded Anquan Boldin to Baltimore. That leaves Matt Leinart as the starting QB, and it also deals a strong blow to Arizona's explosive passing game. While we don't expect the Cardinals to abandon throwing the ball, they could lean on Wells and the run game a lot more -- something that was reaffirmed when the team signed left guard Alan Faneca in late April. Wells played well as a rookie with 176 carries for 793 yards (4.5 avg.) and seven touchdowns. He also added 12 catches for 143 yards and lost two fumbles. Wells got off to a slow start, but he finished strong with three touchdowns in his final four games. He will continue to share carries with Tim Hightower, but Wells easily has more upside. Though he does have an injury history that is of concern, Fantasy owners should consider Wells as a high-end No. 2 RB worth a pick beginning in Round 3. In deeper formats, he could be selected at the end of Round 2 since he's potentially Arizona's second-best weapon behind Larry Fitzgerald.

Brian Westbrook, SF

Bye: 9

Brian Westbrook signed with the 49ers in August, and he will likely be the No. 2 RB in San Francisco behind Frank Gore, though rookie Anthony Dixon could claim that role. Westbrook has the chance to play in passing situations and also help Gore on rushing downs. Westbrook was a star in Philadelphia for eight years before the Eagles released him after an injury-filled 2009. He's no longer a star RB, but he could be useful if the 49ers use him in the right role. We see him as a reserve Fantasy RB with his value slightly higher in leagues where receptions count. At best he's worth a late-round pick on Draft Day.

LenDale White, DEN

Bye: 9

LenDale White has plenty of football left in his tank at age 25. He rushed for 1,110 yards in 2007, and for 15 touchdowns in 2008, before losing playing time to Chris Johnson in Tennessee in 2009. While his work ethic, body shape and off-field problems have been questioned in the past, he certainly fills a void for the Broncos in the short-term and could end up contributing as part of the Broncos' offense for the year. We'll keep tabs on him, but he can still be an effective short-yardage back and thus be a consideration near the end of Fantasy drafts, especially in touchdown-only leagues. Just keep in mind that he's not going to be helpful for the first four weeks of the season.

Cadillac Williams, TB

Bye: 4

Cadillac Williams is looking to pick up where he left off last season. Returning to form in 2009 while playing in 16 games for the first time in his career, Williams totaled 823 rush yards on 211 carries (3.9 avg.) with four touchdowns and 217 yards on 28 catches (7.8 avg.) and three more scores. The 1,040 total yards and career-best seven total touchdowns made for a good year for Williams, but expectations will be higher this season now that he's put two major knee injuries in his rear-view mirror. The Bucs won't dedicate the entire rushing workload to Williams, but after finishing 2009 with back-to-back games with at least 20 carries, odds are he'll be the featured guy in Tampa's backfield (Derrick Ward will pick up some reps). Williams has all sorts of upside and is worth considering as a solid No. 3 Fantasy RB worth a pick between Rounds 6 and 8 in drafts.

DeAngelo Williams, CAR

Bye: 6

Panthers RB DeAngelo Williams enters this season in a contract year, but he will again share carries with Jonathan Stewart. After an amazing breakout year in 2008, Williams continued to deliver handsome numbers in 2009 until an ankle injury plagued him late in the year and ultimately cost him three games. Sharing the rushing workload with Stewart, Williams had 1,117 yards on 216 carries (a 5.2 avg.) with seven touchdowns and 252 yards on 29 catches (8.7 avg.). Williams had four games with over 100 rushing yards (over 120 rush yards, actually), seven games with 100 total yards and eight games with 100 total yards and/or a touchdown (all came before his ankle injury). Though Stewart wound up with better numbers thanks to a late-season surge, it's clear as day that the Panthers are a running team and that both backs can do well in a given week, especially against bad run defenses. Expect a healthy and reliable Williams to be a fixture in the first 15 picks of every Fantasy draft this summer and wind up as a No. 1 Fantasy rusher.

Ricky Williams, MIA

Ricky Williams turned back the clock in 2009 when he had 241 carries for 1,121 yards (4.7 avg.) and 11 touchdowns with 35 catches for 264 yards and two more scores. He did well replacing an injured Ronnie Brown (foot) and finished the year with double-digit Fantasy points in 10 games -- all at 32 years old. Though he's been hinting at retirement, and though the Dolphins acquired receiver Brandon Marshall, he's expected to share carries with Brown again in 2010 in an offense that will make use of the run game. If Brown is limited with a foot injury he's working his way back from then Williams' Fantasy value will improve heading into the season. But even if Brown is ready for Week 1 as expected, look for Williams to play a significant role. He will continue to get carries and should be considered a No. 3 Fantasy running back worth drafting with a mid-round pick.

Albert Young, MIN

Vikings youngster Albert Young totaled 53 rush yards on 12 carries in 2009, most of them coming in Week 17 in a blowout win against the Giants. There was talk that Young would back up Adrian Peterson following Chester Taylor's signing with Chicago, but the Vikings drafted Toby Gerhart with a second-round pick. That ended that speculation. Young isn't worth owning in Fantasy play so long as he's without playing time.

Wide Receivers

Devin Aromashodu, CHI

Bears WR Devin Aromashodu was a little-known receiver before breaking out with an eight-catch, 76-yard, one-touchdown effort against the Packers in Week 14. Then he struck again in Week 16, dazzling the Vikings for 150 yards on seven catches with a touchdown. He finished with two touchdowns in Week 17, adding five grabs for 46 yards and finishing what is actually his fourth NFL season strong. In total Aromashodu caught 24 passes for 298 yards (12.4 avg.) with four touchdowns, the second-most of any Bears wide receiver. Aromashodu is expected to compete for a starting job next season, but he's already a leg up on the competition because QB Jay Cutler has sung his praises and wants to connect with the 6-foot-2 receiver in the future. The addition of Mike Martz as offensive coordinator will only help the team's passing game. Aromashodu is worth drafting late on the hopes that he sticks in the Bears offense and works enough to have a shot at posting over 800 yards in 2010. It only helps his cause that he'll be a restricted free agent after 2010, giving him even more motivation to play well this season.

Miles Austin, DAL

Miles Austin is a restricted free agent this offseason, but he's expected to stay with the Cowboys. Austin had a breakout year in 2009 and will look to build on that this season. Austin reached the Pro Bowl last season with 81 catches for 1,320 yards and 11 touchdowns and has become Tony Romo's go-to receiver. He said in an interview with CBSsports.com that he wants to keep improving in 2010. "It's just a lot of work," Austin said. "I've always been trying to get better. It's a lot of work, a lot of practice and a lot of extra stuff. I'm going to continue to try and do it." We like Austin as a No. 1 Fantasy WR in 2010, and he should be drafted somewhere around Round 3 in all leagues. The Cowboys aren't afraid to throw a lot and Romo has plenty of trust in Austin. There is a chance he could just be a one-year wonder, but we don't see it based on his consistency

Jason Avant returns to the Eagles this season where he will be the No. 3 WR behind DeSean Jackson and Jeremy Maclin. Avant had a career-best 41 receptions for 587 yards and three touchdowns last season as Philadelphia's slot receiver. He has 103 catches and eight touchdowns in four seasons. Avant has potential to be a quality Fantasy option, but he's only worth using in deep leagues as a one-week replacement. Ignore him in most formats on Draft Day.

Donnie Avery, STL

Donnie Avery is entering his third season, which is typically the year when wide receivers have a breakout campaign. This is also the year where the Rams gave him a QB to work with in rookie Sam Bradford, who was drafted at No. 1 overall. But even with that positive outlook, Avery has a lot of work to do. Avery had 47 catches for 589 yards and five touchdowns in 2009 while dealing with Marc Bulger, Kyle Boller and Keith Null at QB, but thanks to his speed he does have potential to do well in the Rams' West Coast offense. We like Avery as a sleeper in deep leagues this season, making him worthy of a late-round pick.

Arrelious Benn, TB

The Buccaneers traded up three spots in the second round of the NFL draft and selected Illinois receiver Arrelious Benn with the 39th overall pick. Wide receiver was a priority after the Bucs did not re-sign Antonio Bryant after last season's 3-13 finish. Benn should get an opportunity to play right away for Tampa Bay. Their receiving cupboard was bare before his arrival, so it's not like he's going to waste away on the bench. So long as he has a good camp, Benn will have a shot at posting decent totals, especially for a rookie receiver. He's worth a middle- to late-round pick in seasonal drafts, a middle-round choice in dynasty/keeper leagues and a late first-round pick in rookie-only drafts.

Earl Bennett, CHI

Earl Bennett's second season with the Bears was much better than his rookie campaign. Working with a familiar face in Jay Cutler (they played together in college) and in a more prominent role, Bennett caught 54 passes for 717 yards (13.3 avg.) with two touchdowns, both coming late in the year. Bennett didn't have any 100-yard games but had four-plus receptions six times and at least 50 yards receiving seven times. The addition of Mike Martz as offensive coordinator will only help the team's passing game. Though he won't be mistaken for an elite Fantasy wideout, Bennett is worth owning in deeper PPR leagues as a reserve receiver. And don't forget, he's entering his third season, which is typically the year when receivers have a breakout campaign.

Bernard Berrian, MIN

Bye: 4

A torn hamstring got Vikings WR Bernard Berrian off to a slow start to the 2009 season, and as a result he finished with 618 yards on 55 catches (11.2 avg.) with four touchdowns. He also had no 100-yard games. The alarming stat drop is in his receiving average, down from 20.1 a year ago, thanks partly to his hamstring and partly to his role changing since the Vikings saw big production from WRs Sidney Rice and Percy Harvin along with TE Visanthe Shiancoe. But Rice is slated to miss half of the season following late August hip surgery, so Berrian should replace him and be a candidate to put up some really nice stats. We like him as a low-end No. 3 Fantasy WR worth a pick between Rounds 8 and 9. If you get him, you might want to consider snaking Rice with a pick a couple of rounds later.

Davone Bess, MIA

Bye: 5

The Dolphins are hoping to count on Davone Bess as at least a quality slot receiver and at best a good complementary option to new starting wideout Brandon Marshall. Bess had 76 catches for 758 yards (10.0 avg.) in 2009, which led the team, but he only scored two touchdowns and clearly positioned himself as a talented short- and mid-range possession receiver (only six of his 76 receptions were good for 20-plus yards yet 48 of his 76 grabs – 63.1 pct. -- were good for first downs or touchdowns). The addition of Marshall should be good news for Bess since it will mean defenses won't key in on him very often, plus he's entering his third year in the NFL, which is typically the season when wide receivers break out. Bess' upside is ruined with Marshall on the roster, but he could still be counted on as a good reserve in PPR formats and a decent reserve in deeper Fantasy leagues.

Anquan Boldin, BAL

Bye: 8

Anquan Boldin is entering a new chapter in his career after being traded from Arizona to Baltimore in March. He then signed a four-year, $28 million contract, which includes $10 million guaranteed. Boldin has the potential to be a No. 1 Fantasy WR with the Ravens, and he should thrive playing with QB Joe Flacco, who is an upgrade over what Boldin would have had with the Cardinals in Matt Leinart now that Kurt Warner has retired. We like Boldin as a must-start Fantasy option worth a pick beginning in Round 3 on Draft Day. He has at least 80 catches in five of his seven seasons in the NFL. He also has five years with at least 1,000 yards receiving and four years with at least seven touchdowns. He should match all three of those marks in Baltimore. Health is always a concern for Boldin, but he's worth the risk based on his production. Look for him to play at a high level with his new team.

Dwayne Bowe, KC

Bye: 4

Dwayne Bowe has the chance for a big season in 2010 now that Charlie Weis is the offensive coordinator in Kansas City. That should mean even more passing for the Chiefs, and Bowe has a lot to prove this season. He entered 2009 in the doghouse of new coach Todd Haley, but he started out the season playing well. He had four games with double digits in Fantasy points in the first seven weeks, including four touchdowns. But then Bowe was suspended for four games for violating the league's policy on performance enhancing drugs. He was quiet upon his return, and now Fantasy owners are wondering if he can still play at a high level. We expect him to -- Matt Cassel is a developing QB, and the addition of Weis will enhance the offense and Bowe's role in it. Consider Bowe a No. 2 Fantasy WR worth drafting around Round 5 or 6 depending on the size of your league. Remember, in Bowe's first two seasons he had 156 catches for 2,017 yards and 12 touchdowns and is capable of putting up outstanding stats.

Steve Breaston, ARI

Bye: 6

Steve Breaston is expected to take a huge leap in production this year now that Anquan Boldin has left the Cardinals via a trade to the Ravens. He is a restricted free agent, but Breaston is expected to stay with the Cardinals, who need him to develop into a star. Breaston was a Fantasy breakout in 2008 while replacing Boldin before dealing with injuries last season, which led to nominal stats. He should rebound well since he's expected to start across from Larry Fitzgerald and see plenty of single coverage. Matt Leinart will take over for the retired Kurt Warner, which could put a dent in the Cardinals' explosive passing game, but the increase Breaston will see in playing time and targets makes him a solid No. 3 Fantasy WR with the chance to become a starter during the year. He is easily worth a mid-round pick in all leagues on Draft Day.

Kenny Britt, TEN

Bye: 9

You have to take notice of a rookie who leads his team in receiving, and that's exactly what Kenny Britt did last season with the Titans. The exceptionally athletic 6-foot-3 WR finished his first campaign with 701 yards on 42 catches (16.7 avg.) and three touchdowns. A whopping 34 of his 42 grabs were good for first downs or touchdowns, and 10 of his catches were good for 20-plus yards. We think Britt has a chance to improve on his numbers in 2010, especially when you consider that all of his touchdowns and a good chunk of his yardage came with Vince Young under center. Young confirmed to CBSsports.com this offseason that he likes what the future has in store for Britt, and we see him as a very worthwhile sleeper to target on Draft Day. Draft him with a pick between Rounds 8 and 9 as a safe No. 3 Fantasy WR, though he has the potential to be much more than that.

Antonio Bryant signed with Cincinnati this offseason where he was expected to be the No. 2 WR for the Bengals opposite Chad Ochocinco. But those plans derailed following a balky knee during spring minicamps and the Bengals' signing of Terrell Owens in late July. Now Bryant is unlikely to land the stats he might have had in Cincinnati with Owens likely pushing him out of a starting role. You can consider Bryant with a late-round pick in drafts, but you're better off checking him out off waivers if he finds playing time this season.

Dez Bryant, DAL

The Dallas Cowboys moved up in the NFL Draft to select Oklahoma State WR Dez Bryant. The 6-foot-2, 225-pound Bryant was an All-American in 2008 when he turned 87 receptions into 1,480 yards and 19 touchdowns. His stock slid after his suspension for lying to the NCAA about his activities with former NFL standout Deion Sanders, a suspension that kept him off the field nearly all of last season. There were other questions about him, such as being late to meetings and even games. Nobody questions his skills. The Cowboys believe Bryant will make an impact right away as a punt returner, but he will also see time at WR. We'll find out how Bryant fits in with the Cowboys, but he has minimal Fantasy value in 2010 in seasonal leagues. The Cowboys will get him on the field, but he will be low on the pecking order for targets behind Miles Austin and Jason Witten and probably even Roy Williams. At best, consider drafting Bryant with a late-round pick and hope he sees the field more as a receiver and less as a return man. In keeper and rookie-only drafts, however, Bryant has significantly more value since he could end up pairing with Austin in the future as a starting receiver for the Cowboys.

Nate Burleson, DET

Nate Burleson leaves Seattle and heads to Detroit, where he will likely be the No. 2 option opposite Calvin Johnson. Burleson has the potential to be a No. 3 Fantasy WR if Matthew Stafford continues to develop in his second year, but you should plan on drafting Burleson as a No. 4 option with a late-round pick. Johnson will draw plenty of coverage, leaving Burleson with a lot of one-on-one opportunities. Burleson is coming off a productive year in 2009 with 63 catches for 812 yards and three touchdowns, and some of his best work came playing in domes (including his smashing 2006 season in Minnesota). His stats last year weren't outstanding, but then again neither were the Seahawks' quarterbacks. A late-season injury is nothing to be worried about – we think Burleson is a good middle- to late-round pick as a solid reserve Fantasy receiver. After all, the Lions should find themselves passing quite a bit in 2010.

Greg Camarillo returned from a torn ACL in 2008 to play fairly well in 2009 with 50 catches for 552 yards (11.0 avg.), albeit with no touchdowns. His chances to score often in 2010 took a hit when the Dolphins traded for Brandon Marshall in mid-April. At the very least Camarillo will compete for a regular spot on the field, but that won't necessarily translate well to big statistics. He is a good complementary wide receiver for the Dolphins, but he's never going to start for your Fantasy team. While he might be worth adding off the waiver wire during the season in 2010, he should not be drafted in any league.

In nine games following his release from San Diego, Chambers had 36 catches for 608 yards and four touchdowns and had the best production of his career since 2005 with the Dolphins. Austin Collie, IND

The Colts expect WR Austin Collie to continue in his development in 2010 after a solid rookie season. Collie saw a healthy amount of playing time in Indy's potent offense after Anthony Gonzalez was injured in Week 1, filling the slot and coming down with 60 catches for 676 yards (11.3 avg.) and a 2009 rookie-best seven touchdowns. He had at least four catches in half of his regular-season games. He even kept up the successful play in the postseason with 17 catches for 241 yards (14.2 avg.) and two scores. Collie's potential is very appealing in that he's tough to properly cover at the same time as Reggie Wayne, Dallas Clark, Pierre Garcon and Anthony Gonzalez in the Colts' offense, and that can lead to some strong weeks. Assuming he retains his role in the offense, which he should, Collie is a very capable No. 3 Fantasy WR, especially in PPR formats. With a full season of work under his belt and a second camp to learn from, he could be freakishly good. We wouldn't hesitate to snap him up with a mid-round pick, and a good indicator of when he'll fly off boards is when teammates Gonzalez and Garcon get taken.

Saints WR Marques Colston put down his third 1,000-yard season in four years in 2009 with an abundance of touchdowns, making him one of the safest picks in Fantasy Football. In fact, in every year that Colston has played at least 14 games he's had 70 or more catches, 1,000 or more yards and eight or more touchdowns. That was the case in 2009 when he grabbed 70 passes for 1,074 yards (15.3 avg.) and nine touchdowns with two fumbles. He also had 188 yards and a touchdown in three postseason games. But he also had offseason knee surgery that wasn't discovered until the start of training camp. The Saints are brushing it off as a small arthroscopic procedure used to clean up some "lingering" issues, but knee problems are significant no matter what. So long as he's healthy and gets in a little preseason work, Colston is a solid Fantasy WR and a sure-fire Top-40 pick as a No. 1 option. Considering his track record and the passing tendencies of the Saints' offense, he's a great guy to have on your team, though his track record of injuries is a reason to not completely fall for him.

Jerricho Cotchery, NYJ

Jerricho Cotchery might be QB Mark Sanchez's favorite target, but that status could change in 2010. Cotchery led the Jets in receiving in 2009 with 57 catches for 821 yards (14.4 yards per catch) and three touchdowns. He had at least 70 receiving yards in the first four games of the season as Sanchez appeared to favor Cotchery, and that continued even once Braylon Edwards joined the team. But Cotchery is never going to post overwhelming stats, especially with Santonio Holmes joining the Jets this offseason, and the Jets are a run-first team. Cotchery should be considered a low-end No. 3 Fantasy WR at best and is worth a pick starting in Round 8 or 9. He should improve as Sanchez continues to develop, but don't expect Cotchery to be a big stat producer.

Michael Crabtree, SF

Michael Crabtree will finally have a full offseason with the 49ers, and he's expected to take the next step in his progression in his second year. Crabtree had an abbreviated rookie season in 2009 following a contract holdout since he missed the first five games of the year. When he finally signed and took the field he played well, owning 48 catches for 625 yards (13.0 yards per catch) and two touchdowns. We like Crabtree as a middle-end No. 3 Fantasy WR this season with potential to grow into a larger role, particularly in PPR leagues. Consider Crabtree with a middle- to late-round pick in drafts.

Josh Cribbs, CLE

For a guy who has never had more than 550 yards from scrimmage in his career, Browns WR/KR Josh Cribbs sure has received a lot of attention. He signed a contract extension this offseason thanks to his 2009 campaign, which saw him get 135 rush yards, 381 receiving yards, two offensive touchdowns and four special-teams scores. It is believed that Cribbs will see more work in the Browns' offense in 2010 in a number of roles: Wildcat QB, RB and WR. We expect him to surpass 550 total yards from scrimmage, but unless you get credit for special teams touchdowns, Cribbs isn't worth drafting this summer.

Eric Decker, DEN

The Broncos drafted WR Eric Decker in Round 3 of the NFL Draft at No. 78 overall out of Minnesota. He is coming off a foot injury, which caused him to miss five games last year, and that's worth keeping an eye on heading into training camp. The Broncos are looking for help at WR with Brandon Marshall now in Miami. They added WR Demaryius Thomas in Round 1, and Decker could also help fill the role if he's healthy. Keep an eye on Decker and see if he's healthy, and he could be worth a late-round pick in deep seasonal leagues. In keeper formats and rookie-only drafts, Decker is worth drafting with a late-round pick as well.

Early Doucet, ARI

Early Doucet is expected to take a huge leap in production this year now that Anquan Boldin has left the Cardinals via trade to the Ravens. He is expected to be the No. 3 WR in Arizona behind Larry Fitzgerald and Steve Breaston. Doucet is also entering his third season, which is typically when wide receivers have a breakout year, and he displayed his talents during the 2009 postseason. Doucet led the Cardinals in receiving in two playoff games with 14 catches for 145 yards and two touchdowns. Matt Leinart will take over for the retired Kurt Warner, which could put a dent in the Cardinals' explosive passing game, but the increase Doucet will see in playing time and targets makes him a sleeper on Draft Day. He is definitely worth a late-round pick in all leagues, and it also helps that Doucet is entering a potential contract year.

A torn ACL suffered last August shelved WR Harry Douglas for the entire 2009 season. But Douglas got back into the swing of things in mid-August and looks to be recovered. A short, shifty receiver perfect for the slot, Douglas could emerge as a 30-to-40 catch WR with some solid outings this season if he's healthy and mentally over his injury. He's only worth drafting late as a flier in

Donald Driver, GB

Even at the ripe old age of 34, Packers WR Donald Driver was very effective. Posting his sixth consecutive 1,000-yard season, Driver caught 70 passes for 1,061 yards (15.2 avg.) and six touchdowns. This was a solid performance for him as he posted his best receiving average since he broke out in 2002 and scored one fewer touchdown than he had in 2007 and 2008 combined. Most of Driver's best stats came in the first half of the season – four of his scores came then. With the exception of a dynamite performance at Detroit on Thanksgiving, he did not deliver more than seven Fantasy points based on standard scoring in any game from Weeks 10 through 17. This could be a signal that the veteran's endurance isn't what it once was, or that the ball went in other directions as the Packers' offense got stronger as the season went on. He also had offseason knee surgery, although he's expected to be fine for the start of training camp. Either way, there's no denying Driver's ability, but there's also no denying that his age might continue to be a factor. Making things interesting is his contract status: He's scheduled to be a free agent after the 2010 season. With the franchise record for receiving yards in his sights (he's 507 yards shy of catching James Lofton's 9,656 and 950 yards shy of 10,000), expect Driver to put up one more productive year. Draft him with the intention of being a No. 3 Fantasy WR during the middle rounds, but there's always the chance that he starts the 2010 season hot and finds a spot in your starting lineup – just as he did in 2009.

Julian Edelman, NE

Julian Edelman will see a significant boost in value for the early part of the season with Wes Welker coming off a knee injury. As such, he should be considered a sleeper. Welker tore the ACL and MCL in his left knee in the season finale in 2009 and could miss the start of 2010, which will allow Edelman to see an increased role. Last year as a rookie, mostly replacing Welker as the team's interior slot receiver, Edelman finished with 37 catches for 359 yards and one touchdown. In two games in place of Welker -- Week 2 at the Jets when Welker was out with a different knee injury and Week 17 against the Texans when Welker was hurt -- Edelman had 18 catches for 201 yards and effectively was a version of Welker. It's obvious Tom Brady trusts Edelman when Welker is out, and as such Edelman is worth drafting with a late-round pick in all leagues, especially formats that count a point per catch, and especially by those owners who take Welker with a mid-round pick.

Armanti Edwards, CAR

The Panthers beefed up their receiving corps with the addition of Appalachian State's Armanti Edwards. Edwards enters the NFL as a receiver and kick returner after playing quarterback for the Mountaineers. Edwards has excellent speed (4.44 in the 40-yard dash) and should battle for a spot along the WR depth chart and for special teams work in camp. He has a chance to be a quality kick-return man for the Panthers, so if you're in a league where special-teams play counts Edwards could be a nice late-round steal. Otherwise he should only be drafted in dynasty/keeper leagues with a late-round pick and rookie-only drafts with a mid-round pick.

Braylon Edwards, NYJ

Braylon Edwards signed his one-year tender with the Jets, ensuring a sizable salary for 2010 and the ability to be in a contract year after this season. But that doesn't mean he'll be the primary receiver for the Jets – in fact, he's not going to be after the team traded for Santonio Holmes in mid-April. Edwards continued his inconsistent play once coming to the Jets in a trade from Cleveland last season. In 12 games in New York, Edwards had 35 catches for 541 yards (15.5 yards per catch) and four touchdowns with a lost fumble. He added another 10 catches for 139 yards in four games with the Browns before the trade. Edwards was a tremendous Fantasy option in 2007 with 80 catches for 1,289 yards and 16 touchdowns, but in two seasons since then he has 100 catches for 1,553 yards and seven touchdowns, so he hasn't come close to matching that production from '07. He could rebound a bit this year with a full offseason with QB Mark Sanchez, which should help, but Edwards has to prove it first and also overcome losing targets to the rest of the Jets receivers. Oh, and the Jets are one of the NFL's most committed run-first offenses. He's not an elite WR anymore, but he does have value as a reserve. Consider Edwards a quality reserve Fantasy WR worth a middle- to late-round pick and hope he can re-establish himself in 2010.

Lee Evans, BUF

Lee Evans will try to rebound from the worst year of his career. Evans, like the rest of the Bills, struggled in 2009 with a career-low 44 catches and 612 yards (13.9 yards per catch). He did have seven touchdowns, but he didn't benefit much playing alongside Terrell Owens. Now, Owens is expected to leave Buffalo as a free agent, but Evans needs plenty of help to regain his Fantasy value even as the No. 1 target for the Bills. Buffalo has issues at QB (who will start among Trent Edwards, Ryan Fitzpatrick, Brian Brohm or someone outside the organization?) and the offensive line, and new coach Chan Gailey has a lot of work to do but will surely utilize the veteran receiver. Evans is worth drafting as a low-end No. 3 Fantasy WR with a middle- to late-round pick, but his supporting cast will go a long way in determining just how useful he'll be. He does have potential since he has at least seven touchdowns in four of his six years in the NFL, but the Bills also have plenty of holes.

Larry Fitzgerald, ARI

For the first time in Larry Fitzgerald's career he won't have Anquan Boldin as a teammate. He also loses Kurt Warner as his starting QB. That makes for a lot of transition for Fitzgerald in Arizona, and it's enough to make Fantasy owners a little nervous. His new quarterback is expected to be Matt Leinart, a passer he's caught just five touchdowns from in four seasons. He also has just one 100-yard game with Leinart under center from beginning to end, and his totals in games with Leinart and without Boldin aren't encouraging: seven catches for 196 yards and a touchdown. Factor that with the Cardinals' expected push toward utilizing their ground game and Fitzgerald isn't as exciting. But there is a big factor you may not be considering: He's as polished and potent a receiver as they come in the NFL, and talent goes a long way. Fitzgerald will likely slip a few spots based on the expectation he could struggle now that Warner and Boldin are gone, but considering his talent you should still plan on taking Fitzgerald somewhere in Round 2. We still expect him to play pretty well despite all the changes.

high on Floyd after having a career season in which he tallied 45 catches for 776 yards, but he only scored one touchdown. We can see Floyd taking the next step in his career, especially with Jackson out of the picture, and playing in a contract year should only motivate him further. So long as Jackson is out, Floyd is worth a mid-round pick as a medium-risk, high-reward Fantasy WR.

Jabar Gaffney, DEN

Jabar Gaffney is an intriguing Fantasy option this season following the Broncos' decision to trade Brandon Marshall to Miami in mid-April. There's a chance that Gaffney's playing time and role in the Denver offense will increase now that Marshall is gone thanks to how he finished the 2009 season. But in reality, rookie Demaryius Thomas will likely replace Marshall and not Gaffney. In 2009, Gaffney's first with the Broncos, he finished with 54 catches for 732 yards (13.6 yards per catch) and two touchdowns. But the majority of his production came in the final two games of the season against Philadelphia and Kansas City when he had 21 catches for 282 yards and the two scores. In the season finale against the Chiefs, with Marshall out, Gaffney had 14 catches for 213 yards. Don't plan on drafting Gaffney in the majority of leagues now that Thomas is on the roster.

Justin Gage, TEN

Justin Gage will try to regain his spot in the Titans' offense this season after getting shaken up last season due to a serious spine injury. Gage started last season strong with 13 catches for 142 yards and a touchdown in his first three games, but he didn't piece together another three-game streak like that the rest of the season. Once he got hurt in Week 9, he wasn't the same even with two touchdowns on two grabs vs. the Dolphins. His 28 catches for 383 yards and three touchdowns on the season were a disappointment, not to mention some of his worst totals since becoming a Titan. Gage's health will play a role in exactly how he's used in 2010, but with second-year WR Kenny Britt along with WR Nate Washington slated for playing time, Gage might not like what's in store for him. That said, keep him off of Fantasy rosters on Draft Day and stick with him as a one-week replacement option off waivers.

Pierre Garcon, IND

If Pierre Garcon's second NFL season was any indication of what's to come in his third year, we're in for some big stats. Pressed into action after Anthony Gonzalez hurt his knee in Week 1, Garcon developed into a suitable option for Peyton Manning to target in addition to Reggie Wayne and Dallas Clark. He finished the regular season with 47 catches for 765 yards (16.3 avg.) and four touchdowns in 14 games, but it's his postseason play that might send his game to the next level. In three playoff outings Garcon caught 21 passes for 251 yards and two touchdowns, leading the Colts in all categories. Though it remains to be seen how much playing time Garcon will have in 2010 with Gonzalez coming back from his knee injury, along with the presence of Austin Collie, we suspect that Garcon has done enough to earn a significant role in the offense. Your safest bet is to consider Garcon a No. 3 Fantasy WR worth a mid-round, but someone in every league will believe the best is yet to come from him and draft him as a low-end No. 2 option. He'll be an interesting receiver to watch in drafts before the season.

Anthony Gonzalez, IND

Anthony Gonzalez is planning to come back strong in 2010 after missing essentially all of last season with a knee ligament injury. While he missed time he saw two receivers – Pierre Garcon and Austin Collie -- develop into legitimate threats in the Colts' offense and helped the team make it to Super Bowl XLIV. Gonzalez told CBSSports.com in February that "there's no question that I'll be back playing next year," and he proved it when he began practicing with the team in OTAs, but the question remains what role he'll play with Garcon and Collie also in the mix. He's a risky choice as anything more than a reserve Fantasy WR because he hasn't ever been a good stat producer to begin with and now he has to share reps with the guys who picked up his slack last season. Think about him with a late-round pick, with his value increasing if he can piece together a promising preseason.

James Hardy will enter his third season in the NFL, and he's trying to prove he can be a productive player after a standout college career at Indiana. Hardy tore his ACL at the end of his rookie year in 2008. He came back at the end of the 2009 season and finished the year with one catch for 9 yards in two games. Hardy has plenty of potential as a red-zone target based on his size at 6-foot-5, but he has to show his skills on the field first. Don't plan on drafting Hardy in any leagues, but he could take the next step in his career if he can stay healthy and the Bills get some improved QB play. Since this is his third season in the NFL, Hardy is worth keeping an eye on in case he has a breakout year. Hartline had a productive rookie season for the Dolphins in '09 with 31 catches for 506 yards (16.3 yards per catch) and three touchdowns. He also added four carries for 29 yards and a touchdown on the ground. Hartline is a good complementary wide receiver for the Dolphins and could develop into a decent Fantasy option, especially in leagues where receptions count, but he's not expected to become a standout Fantasy wide receiver.

Percy Harvin, MIN

Percy Harvin beat all expectations with a phenomenal rookie campaign. He caught 60 passes for 790 yards (13.2 avg.) with six touchdowns, adding 135 rush yards on 15 carries and another 1,156 yards on 42 kickoff returns with two more scores. While his stats were ultimately good, he was inconsistent as he'd spend a couple of weeks playing real well before tanking. He also had to overcome playing with severe migraine headaches several times during the season. If he can continue to play in a big role with the Vikings' offense and stay on the field, Harvin will explode in 2010 -- especially with big target Sidney Rice missing half of the season following late-August hip surgery. Some owners might reach for Harvin before he should be taken because of his flash and upside, but his best Fantasy role is as a low-end No. 2/top-end No. 3 Fantasy WR worth a pick alongside other low-end No. 2 WRs (you won't get him otherwise) between Rounds 6 and 7. If return yardage counts in your league, then Harvin actually moves up a round because of what his potential is as a kickoff returner.

Devin Hester, CHI

Bears WR Devin Hester set career-highs in receptions and receiving yards with 57 catches for 757 yards (13.3 avg.) and matched his career-best with three touchdowns, but his season was considered a huge disappointment in spite of that. He got off to a tremendous start with a touchdown in two of his first three games and also posted his first career and only 100-yard game at Cincinnati in Week 7. But limited production paired with calf and ankle injuries that sidelined him for three weeks essentially cost him the last six games of his season, and a left shoulder injury he played through robbed him of some physical skills. So while his totals didn't make him a desirable Fantasy option, the reality is that he still could develop into a quality receiver that Fantasy owners could count on. He caught at least four passes in nine contests and had at least 70 receiving yards in seven outings. He's one to watch this offseason, especially if the Bears do not add another receiver to their lineup. The addition of Mike Martz as offensive coordinator will only help the team's passing game. He's draftable with a late-round pick this summer as a quality reserve wideout with potential to be a No. 3 option.

Santonio Holmes, NYJ

Santonio Holmes was traded to the Jets in April, and it's there where he'll finish out his contract. Holmes became unappealing to the Steelers after multiple character issues came up this offseason, the biggest of which were being charged with assault in an Orlando nightclub and word getting out that he was going to be suspended four games for violating the NFL's substance abuse policy. Those things prompted the trade to the Jets, where he'll play in their run-first offense alongside Braylon Edwards, Jericho Cotchery and tight end Dustin Keller and catch passes from second-year quarterback Mark Sanchez. On one hand, we like the idea of Holmes playing motivated not just for a new contract but also to prove that he's a consistent player at a high level. But on the other hand, a four-game suspension will take him off the field for four meaningful Fantasy weeks, plus his situation in New York is hardly as appealing as his situation in Pittsburgh was. We doubt that Holmes can get to 1,000 yards this season, and his touchdown production could also suffer some. Holmes has slid to a low-end No. 2/top-end No. 3 Fantasy WR worth a pick between Rounds 7 and 9. Don't expect big things from him on a weekly basis.

Last year, Houshmandzadeh finished with 79 catches for 911 yards and three touchdowns, his lowest stat totals in each category since 2004. Despite offseason hernia surgery we expect Houshmandzadeh to play better this year, but he's no longer an elite Fantasy option. He'll have big weeks at times -- he had three games with double digits in Fantasy points in 2009 -- but those aren't the norm for Houshmandzadeh any more. We view Houshmandzadeh as a low-end No. 2 option. He's still good enough to start most weeks since he's the No. 1 target in Seattle, but this passing game has a lot to be desired. Take Houshmandzadeh with a middle- to late-round pick after the top-tier wide receivers are off the board.

DeSean Jackson is entering his third season in the NFL -- and he could actually improve on the eye-popping stats we saw from him in 2009. It's hard to imagine Jackson getting better this year even though wide receivers have a breakout season in their third year, but Jackson has already become a star. His breakout year came in 2009 when he caught 62 passes for 1,156 yards and nine touchdowns. He also had 137 rushing yards and one touchdown. With Kevin Kolb taking over for the Eagles under center, Jackson still has a passer who can get him the ball deep, but also one with a smidge more accuracy than the one he had before. We consider Jackson to be a safe Top 5 player at his position, and plan on taking him with a pick somewhere in Round 2 or 3 in all leagues.

Vincent Jackson has dealt with a horrible offseason. His contract status is up in the air, and he was suspended for three games to start the season for violating the league's substance abuse policy. Jackson pleaded guilty in February to his second DUI since 2006. As for his contract, Jackson remains a restricted free agent after refusing to sign a one-year guaranteed deal for $3.2 million, which was marked down to $600,000 following a June 15 deadline as part of the league's CBA. Jackson, who wants a long-term deal or a trade, is adamant that he will sit out for the first 10 games of the 2010 season (he'd earn credit for playing in '10 by being in six games). His whole situation is a mess, and until it's cleared up Fantasy owners cannot trust him as a No. 1 option. We still consider Jackson a No. 2 Fantasy WR, but his value is on the decline. If he's able to settle his contract situation then he would still be worth a mid-round pick even with the suspension. But if he sticks to his word and plans to holdout for the first 10 games then he would only be worth a late-round pick on Draft Day. There's a lot of risk involved in drafting Jackson, who accounted for 26 percent of the Chargers' receiving yards and 31 percent of the Chargers' receiving touchdowns in 2009, but his talent is obvious when he's on the field.

Michael Jenkins, ATL

Bye: 8

Michael Jenkins continued to be a meandering stat producer in 2009, which is what he'll likely be in 2010. He caught at least 50 passes for the third straight season, but his touchdown production continued to decline and his numbers were fair to modest. He totaled 635 yards on 50 catches with just one touchdown, which came from backup QB Chris Redman and not starter Matt Ryan. When you need a one-week replacement receiver off waivers, think of Jenkins since he could deliver a handful of points. But don't draft him expecting a big season in 2010 since he's been a significant underachiever over the course of his career.

Greg Jennings, GB

Bye: 10

By and large, many Fantasy owners considered Greg Jennings a borderline bust in 2009 as he only scored four regular-season touchdowns and went through several spells of producing only nominal stats. It is believed that Jennings played most of the season banged up but still finished with decent totals: 68 catches for 1,113 yards (16.4 avg.) and four touchdowns. He also had five games over 100 yards receiving -- and nine games under 70 yards receiving. Jennings' touchdown total dropped for the second straight season, but he maintained a powerful receiving average. Fantasy owners who had Jennings in 2009 will be leery of drafting him again, but he's clearly the most polished big-play receiver in an offense that is becoming powerful and aggressive. Still, we also know that he is coming off a season where he just got a nice contract extension, and the Packers now have so many good receiving options for Aaron Rodgers to throw to that Jennings simply might not see as many opportunities as he has in the past. In 2009 for example, he was thrown at just eight more times than teammate Donald Driver. Consider Jennings a borderline No. 1 WR worth a pick between Rounds 5 and 6 in drafts this summer.

Andre Johnson, HOU

Bye: 7

Andre Johnson enters this season as one of the most unstoppable wide receivers in the NFL. His combination of size, strength and speed combined with the Texans' pass-happy offense makes him a candidate for extremely gaudy numbers annually. In 2009 he had 1,569 yards on 101 catches (a career-best 15.5 avg.) with nine touchdowns, marking his second-straight season over 1,500 yards receiving and third with at least eight touchdowns. Johnson failed to score or total 100 yards in just six of his 16 games, meaning that he was extremely reliable for Fantasy owners. It goes without saying that e's one of the safest picks in Fantasy Football and is worthy of an early pick between sixth and 12th overall in all leagues. He's the kind of Fantasy stud you can put in your lineup and never take out.

Calvin Johnson, DET

Bye: 7

A lot of people consider 2009 a bust campaign for Calvin Johnson. His final stat line suggests it was indeed a sad year: 67 catches for 984 yards (14.7 avg.) and five touchdowns with 73 rushing yards. But some hidden numbers suggest otherwise. Johnson only played in 14 games and left another game very early with a knee injury. Johnson also only played nine games that were started by rookie QB Matthew Stafford, easily the Lions' best option at quarterback all season. In fact, Johnson totaled 46 catches for 728 yards (15.8 avg.) and three TDs in those nine games, meaning he had just 19 grabs for 256 yards (13.5 avg.) and two scores in the five other contests he played in without him (including the one he left early with a knee injury). Johnson's health makes him a bit of a risk but no one can look past his potential thanks to his huge size and speed. With a year of work with Matthew Stafford under his belt, the coaching staff staying in place in Detroit and Johnson spending the offseason there working with Stafford and strengthening the muscles in his knee, there's room for optimism that Johnson rebounds strong in 2010. He's still worth drafting as a No. 1 Fantasy WR, but you can get him toward the back of Round 2 this summer instead of the front of Round 2, which is where many owners found him last summer.

Jacoby Jones, HOU

Bye: 7

Jacoby Jones took the next step in his third season by catching six touchdowns, but more is expected from him in 2010. In addition to his six scores, Jones hit career-highs in receptions (27) and receiving yards (437). One issue: In the eight games Jones didn't score in, only twice did he record 20 or more yards receiving. You're looking at a boom-or-bust receiver only worthy of a late-round pick in deeper drafts this summer, but also one in a contract year, so motivation is high. In standard formats look to Jones as a one-week replacement off waivers when he has a favorable matchup. Even with the prospect of a big pay day on the horizon he's not worth a late pick in drafts.

James Jones, GB

Bye: 10

James Jones still didn't top his rookie season numbers in 2009, but he did improve on his sophomore season totals and set a career-high in touchdowns with five. He also caught 32 passes for 440 yards (13.8 avg.). Jones saw more work come his way toward the middle of the season and figures to be one of the many targets for Aaron Rodgers throughout next season. And that's a good thing since he'll be in a contract year and will have plenty of motivation to play big. The biggest obstacle in his way? Playing time -- he's behind Donald Driver and Greg Jennings, plus tight end Jermichael Finley should see more work on the field as well as third-year wide receiver Jordy Nelson. Jones is worth a flier late in deeper drafts, but that's about it so long as the Packers lean on Driver and Jennings as their top two receivers.

Malcolm Kelly, WAS

Bye: 9

Malcolm Kelly might have had the chance for a breakout season in his third year in the NFL, but a slow start to even taking part in practices during training camp has hindered that chance. In two seasons, Kelly is still looking for his first NFL touchdown while he's battled knee injuries. Now he's dealing with a significant hamstring injury. If he can get on the field, he should get some help in the form of new QB Donovan McNabb and new head coach Mike Shanahan, but don't plan on drafting Kelly. He could be worth adding off the waiver wire if he can get healthy and put up some numbers.

Johnny Knox, CHI

Bye: 8

Johnny Knox became an overnight Fantasy hit when he torched the Packers for 82 yards on two catches in Week 1 and then scored in four straight games (one on special teams). Knox hit a wall thereafter but still found a way to end the season with five scores, a team-best among wide receivers, with 527 yards on 45 catches (a surprisingly low 11.7 avg.). He did not play in the team's last two regular season games because of an ankle injury but should be fine for the start of 2010. The addition of Mike Martz as offensive coordinator will only help the team's passing game. Knox is worth owning in deeper leagues that reward special-teams yardage but that's about it. Unless he can hustle for playing time in training camp, expect Knox to see only situational use on offense that might result in limited reps for at least the start of the season.

Bye: 6

The Panthers beefed up their receiving corps with the addition of LSU WR Brandon LaFell in Round 3 of the 2010 NFL Draft. LaFell will battle for playing time in training camp, but he landed on the right team to find it as the Panthers have long needed help at receiver. He should have the chance to contribute in short order there, albeit he's not expected to post huge stats. He's worth a late-round pick in the deepest of seasonal leagues, a middle- to late-round pick in dynasty/keeper leagues and an early- to middle-round pick in rookie-only drafts.

Bye: 8

Jeremy Maclin played well as a rookie in 2009, and he should continue to build on that this season. Maclin had 56 catches for 773 yards and four touchdowns, and he has the chance to become a solid Fantasy option, especially now that Kevin Kolb is under center for the Eagles. We view Maclin as a middle- to low-end No. 3 Fantasy WR worth a pick starting in Round 8 or 9, and don't let an early training camp knee injury hold you back from taking him. In fact, don't be surprised if Maclin is starting for you at some point during the year.

Bye: 8

Mario Manningham is entering his third year in the NFL, and he could be headed for a breakout season. He played well as a sophomore in the early part of 2009 but was limited with shoulder injuries and tailed off. He still finished with 57 catches for 822 yards and five touchdowns – nothing to sneeze at. We like Manningham as a quality reserve Fantasy option since it is expected that he settles into a limited role in the offense behind Steve Smith and Hakeem Nicks, but there's obviously upside here. Plan on drafting Manningham with a late-round pick and hope he continues to improve as he did from his rookie year to his second season and now entering that magical third year.

Brandon Marshall, MIA

Bye: 5

Brandon Marshall got his wish this offseason, departing Denver for Miami via trade in mid-April. It's with the Dolphins where he intends to continue playing at a high level following a four-year contract extension that makes him the highest-paid receiver in NFL history. You can't say he's not deserving after three straight seasons with over 100 catches and 1,100 yards. And with 10 touchdowns last season, you could say that he's on his way to playing at the best possible level he can. It's obvious that he'll be a very important part of the Dolphins offense, but there's a chance he'll fall short of 100 catches simply because the Dolphins will run the ball plenty. He also has to prove he's 100 percent recovered from offseason hip surgery, which will keep him out until training camp. The Dolphins should give Marshall a better chance to add yards to his receptions and thus make his stats more appealing. He'll also continue to see action in the red-zone. Ultimately, Marshall is a quality No. 1 Fantasy WR worth taking somewhere around Round 3 or 4 in all leagues as long as his hip is 100 percent healthy.

Derrick Mason, BAL

Bye: 8

Derrick Mason posted his eighth 1,000-yard season in nine years and third straight with the Ravens in 2009, but he'll have a hard time making it happen again in 2010. Re-signed this offseason, Mason finds the Ravens' receiving corps deeper after the team signed Donte Stallworth and traded for Anquan Boldin. So while his 1,028 yards on 73 catches (14.1 avg.) easily led the team in receiving last year, odds are he won't get very close to those numbers this year. Figure Mason to be a safe No. 3 receiver worth a middle- to late-round pick, and don't let a minor ankle sprain suffered early in training camp factor into your decision to take him.

Mohamed Massaquoi, CLE

Bye: 8

Browns WR Mohamed Massaquoi hopes to add consistency to his 2010 season after being a boom-or-bust Fantasy option as a rookie. Massaquoi finished with 624 yards on 34 catches (a wild 18.4 avg.) with three scores, but most of those stats came in three games against the Bengals, Lions and Raiders when he totaled 16 catches for 324 yards and two touchdowns. The rest of his games were weak as he topped just 40 yards once in those remaining 13 games. The Browns will definitely give Massaquoi the chance to play in 2010, so it's just a matter of him developing consistency. He's worth a late-round pick in drafts as a reserve Fantasy WR with upside, but that's about it.

Dexter McCluster, KC

Bye: 4

The Chiefs drafted WR Dexter McCluster in the second round of the NFL Draft at No. 36 overall. McCluster, who between rushing and receiving accumulated 1,700 yards and 11 touchdowns last year at Ole Miss, will be used in a variety of ways: as a wide receiver, slot receiver, traditional running back and perhaps even as a Wildcat quarterback. We see him lining up in the slot between Dwayne Bowe and Chris Chambers on the outside with either Jamaal Charles or Thomas Jones in the backfield. He will also see time on special teams as a return man, and the Chiefs hope he can be a more offensive version of Dante Hall. We consider McCluster a sleeper this season as a low-end No. 3 Fantasy WR. He's worth a late-round pick in seasonal leagues, especially PPR formats, and he should go with a mid-round selection in rookie-only drafts and keeper formats.

Robert Meachem, NO

Bye: 10

The third year was the charm for Saints WR Robert Meachem, who recorded an impressive five-week string of performances and also pulled off the most controversial Fantasy play of the year. He should continue to see playing time with the Saints in 2010, although toe surgery in the offseason is something to monitor heading into training camp. Meachem had a breakout year in 2009 with 722 yards on 45 catches (16.0 avg.) with nine receiving touchdowns. He also rushed for 82 yards and forced and returned a fumble for a touchdown at Washington. Meachem cooled off in the postseason (25 yards on four catches), but in a five-game stretch from Week 9 to Week 13, Meachem had 21 catches for 346 yards, a 41-yard rush and six touchdowns. If he could somehow find a way to produce that over 16 games and as long as his toe is healthy, he'd be a Fantasy star. But it's that potential that makes Meachem an appealing Fantasy WR in 2010 (playing in a pass-happy offense doesn't hurt things, either). Consider him a low-end No. 2/top-end No. 3 Fantasy WR worth a pick between Rounds 7 and 8 in drafts this summer. And continue to monitor the status of his toe heading into training camp.

Bye: 9

Josh Morgan is expected to start for the 49ers this year opposite Michael Crabtree. He's entering his third year in the NFL, which is typically when wide receivers have a breakout season, so plenty of eyes are on him. In 2009, Morgan was inconsistent at best. He had 52 catches for 527 yards (10.1 yards per catch) with three touchdowns. While Morgan could improve this year, he should enter the season as a one-week replacement in standard leagues or a reserve Fantasy option in deeper formats. He should not be drafted in the majority of leagues. Instead, see how he does early in the season before adding him off the waiver wire, and hopefully this is his breakout year.

Randy Moss, NE

Bye: 5

Randy Moss was inconsistent in his play at times in 2009 and was even accused of giving up during games, but his overall body of work from last year suggests he's still among the best Fantasy wide receivers. Moss tied Larry Fitzgerald for the most touchdowns for a wide receiver in 2009 with 13. He also finished with 83 catches for 1,264 yards (15.2 yards per catch) and a lost fumble. He had nine games with double figures in Fantasy points and three games with five points or less. But this is what you get with Moss most weeks - boom and a little bit of a bust. In the end, his stats should remain at a high level even though he will be 33 this season. In three years with the Patriots he has accumulated 250 catches for 3,765 yards and 47 touchdowns. In two seasons with Tom Brady, Moss has 181 catches for 2,757 yards and 36 touchdowns. He will likely see some extra coverage to start the season with Wes Welker coming off a knee injury, but that could also mean more targets in his direction. And he's also entering a contract year, so one last big pay day likely will motivate Moss to play big. We like Moss as a Top 5 Fantasy WR worth a pick in Round 2. He should have another outstanding season.

Santana Moss, WAS

Bye: 9

Santana Moss has been an inconsistent Fantasy option from year to year and week to week, but he garnered attention this offseason for something more serious: alleged HGH use. His name was tied to a doctor who allegedly gave him some of the illegal drug to help his ailing knee last year, and it could cost him some playing time. Not that that should crush Fantasy owners -- Moss has yet to post back to back 1,000-yard seasons in nine years in the NFL, and only once has he had six or more touchdowns in consecutive seasons (2005-06). In 2009, Moss had just three touchdowns, his lowest total since his rookie season in 2001. He also had only 70 catches for 902 yards. Even with Donovan McNabb coming in at quarterback and head coach Mike Shanahan installing his version of the West Coast offense, there's a cloud over Moss that's tough to shake. Throw in a knee procedure he had this offseason, which may or may not slow him down, and he doesn't register high on the Fantasy scale. Plan on drafting Moss with a middle- to late-round pick as a good reserve Fantasy receiver.

Louis Murphy will look to build on a surprising rookie season with the Raiders in which he finished as the team's most productive wide receiver. He finished the year with 34 catches for 521 yards and four touchdowns and added six carries for 31 yards. The Raiders improved their passing game with the addition of QB Jason Campbell, and that will help Murphy in his growth. Murphy is worth a look with a late-round pick in all Fantasy leagues. Hakeem Nicks was a surprise rookie in 2009 and could be a Fantasy superstar in 2010. He finished last season with 47 catches for 790 yards and six scores and showed plenty of big-play ability. This year he could become more of a go-to threat for Eli Manning, making him a potential breakout player. Steve Smith will remain Manning's favorite target, and Mario Manningham will also play a significant role, but Nicks could become a very important part of the Giants' offense. He did have his fair share of drops as a rookie and will need to become more consistent, but that could come with age and experience. Because of his upside, we view Nicks as a top-end No. 3 Fantasy WR worth a pick between the middle rounds of drafts this summer.

Bye: 6

Chad Ochocinco is hoping to continue to improve this season after a resurgent year in 2009. Ochocinco had his seventh 1,000-yard season in eight years in 2009, and if not for his fourth season with at least nine touchdowns, he would have still been a bit of a disappointment in Fantasy. But Ochocinco didn't focus on his off-field antics and instead played ball, finishing with 1,047 yards on 72 catches (14.5 avg.) with nine end-zone trips. That's not bad considering that the Bengals ran the ball more than threw it. Ochocinco got the help he needed this offseason with the Bengals signing Terrell Owens and Antonio Bryant to help draw coverage. While those two, especially Owens, could steal away targets, Ochocinco should still have another solid year. Consider him a No. 2 Fantasy WR worth a pick between Rounds 4 and 5 this summer.

Terrell Owens signed with the Bengals on the eve of training camp, and he should end up starting for Cincinnati opposite Chad Ochocinco. Owens spent 2009 in Buffalo and posted his lowest stats since 2005 when he was ultimately banished from Philadelphia. Owens finished the season with 55 catches for 829 yards (15.1 yards per catch) and five touchdowns. He also added six carries for 54 yards and a touchdown. Owens is 36 and far from the WR he was during his days with Dallas, Philadelphia and San Francisco, but being paired with Carson Palmer should help his Fantasy value. He could be a serviceable No. 3 Fantasy WR worth a mid-round pick since he's still in tremendous shape and wasn't a distraction for the Bills despite being on a losing team with terrible QB play -- he even had five games with double digits in Fantasy points.

Sidney Rice, MIN Bye: 4

Sidney Rice was expected to continue his onslaught of the league in 2010, but his hip sent him in the opposite direction. Following his breakout 2009 that saw him end up with 83 catches for 1,312 yards (15.8 avg.) and eight touchdowns (with 100 yards and/or a touchdown in 10 of his last 14 games), a hip injury he and the Vikings were hush-hush on this offseason went public in early July, then in late August he had surgery to fix the problem. He is now expected to miss half of the season while on the PUP list. Even though he's in a contract year, he cannot be considered a startable Fantasy WR at this point. Draft him with a middle- to late-round pick with the idea of stashing him at the end of your bench and hoping to put him into lineups toward the second half of the season.

The Cardinals drafted WR Andre Roberts in the third round of the NFL Draft at No. 88 overall. Roberts, from the Citadel, will likely be the No. 4 WR for the Cardinals behind Larry Fitzgerald, Steve Breaston and Early Doucet, and the hope is Roberts can return punts this season. Roberts could play a role on offense if Doucet struggles to step up as the No. 3 WR, but we see Roberts making more of an impact on special teams. Laurent Robinson is looking to pick up where last season ended. In 2009, Robinson was headed toward a breakout season for the Rams before breaking his leg in Week 3. Prior to that, Robinson had 13 catches for 167 yards and one touchdown. He has potential to play well this year with rookie QB Sam Bradford now under center. Consider him a sleeper worthy of a late-round pick, and it helps that he's entering a potential contract year. The one detractor for Robinson could be the addition of rookie WR Mardy Gilyard, who could cut into Robinson's playing time, but we still think Robinson can excel in 2010.

Eddie Royal is entering his third year in the NFL, which is typically when wide receivers have a breakout season. The Broncos would be very happy if that happened as Royal is currently their best receiver following the mid-April trade of Brandon Marshall to Miami. That could change after Denver drafted WR Demaryius Thomas at No. 22 overall, but Royal still has plenty of expectations to fulfill coming into the year. He needs a breakout after a terrible sophomore campaign that saw him muster up just 37 catches for 345 yards (9.3 yards per catch) with no touchdowns. Coach Josh McDaniels said one of his biggest regrets was he didn't involve Royal more, and Royal himself said he struggled with the playbook and roles asked of him, but that should change this season. Obviously, the opportunity will be there for him now that Marshall is gone, but it's a stretch to say he'll be a reliable Fantasy option on a weekly basis. Consider him nothing more than a situational No. 3 Fantasy WR -- he's definitely a solid reserve wideout -- worth taking with a late-round pick in drafts.

Emmanuel Sanders, PIT

Bye: 5

The Steelers spent a third-round pick on SMU WR Emmanuel Sanders in the 2010 NFL Draft. Sanders doesn't have much in the way of size but has good hands and explosiveness. He could figure into the mix at receiver this year with a good training camp -- especially if vets like Antwaan Randle El and Arnaz Battle can't cut the mustard. We'll keep an eye on him for you, but don't expect him to be worthy of anything more than a late-round draft pick in the deepest of seasonal leagues. We like him better with a late pick in dynasty/keeper leagues and a Top-30 choice in rookie-only drafts.

Chaz Schilens, OAK

Bye: 10

Chaz Schilens has a chance for a breakout season this year, his third in the NFL, if he can stay healthy and build off a strong finish in 2009. The addition of QB Jason Campbell should make Schilens a sleeper in 2010, but more foot surgery this offseason and foot problems in the early days of training camp might hurt his chances. A foot injury last August limited Schilens to only eight games last season, but he finished strong with 29 catches for 365 yards (12.6 avg.) and two touchdowns. But because he's dogged by foot problems, he's not even worth drafting any more. Keep him off of Fantasy rosters.

Jordan Shipley, CIN

Bye: 6

The Bengals drafted Texas WR Jordan Shipley with a third-round pick in the 2010 NFL Draft. The record-setting inside receiver could battle for significant playing time with the Bengals in camp this summer. He's one to keep an eye on in the preseason; if we see a lot of him lining up with the first-team offense he could warrant a late-round pick in seasonal drafts. He's a safer bet as a late-round pick in dynasty/keeper leagues and as an early- to middle-round pick in rookie-only formats.

Mike Sims-Walker, JAC

Bye: 9

Mike Sims-Walker finally had the chance to play big in 2009, and he did. Now he hopes to keep it going into 2010. A waiver-wire surprise at the beginning of the season, Sims-Walker effectively played in 14 games and caught 63 passes for 869 yards (13.8 avg.) and seven touchdowns. He played better at home, getting six of his seven scores and all but 19 of his receptions there, so that's something to be mindful of. But Sims-Walker ultimately has room to improve, and that's what will attract Fantasy owners. He's best as a No. 3 Fantasy WR worth a mid-round pick.

Steve Smith, CAR

Bye: 6

Lots of things "snapped" for Steve Smith since late last season. His streak of 1,000-yard receiving seasons for one, and his forearm -- twice. Smith broke his forearm in Week 16 against the Giants, ending his season early, then broke it again at his youth football camp in mid-June. He's not expected to participate in training camp but should take in a preseason game or two and be OK for the start of the season. But there are more issues for Smith with quarterback play and receiving talent around him being key. But late last season Smith got going with Matt Moore at QB and finished with a touchdown in each of his last three games, and that should be his passer in 2010. Though Smith still has some excellent speed, the reality that he's entering his 10th NFL season on a run-first team with no sure thing at QB pushes him out of the No. 1 Fantasy WR category that we've associated him with for a while. He's a good No. 2 option at this point -- especially with his arm in a sling for the month of July -- and he could even slip to the middle rounds in some drafts as owners are scared he'll get hurt or not be ready for Week 1. If you can get him as a No. 2 receiver, you're doing fine, but if you can snare him to be your No. 3 receiver, you're committing larceny.

Steve Smith, NYG

Bye: 8

Steve Smith had a breakout season for the Giants in 2009 -- his third year in the NFL -- and now has to prove he can do it again. Smith set the franchise single-season record for catches in 2009 with 107, and his 1,220 receiving yards were the second-highest total in team history. He also added seven touchdowns. His goal this offseason is to increase his role in the deep passing game, which would only enhance his value. Smith has become Eli Manning's go-to receiver, and we like Smith as a high-end No. 2 Fantasy option, especially since this is a potential contract year for him. In leagues where receptions count, Smith should be considered a No. 1 option, and he's worth drafting in Round 3 in those leagues and Round 4 in standard-scoring formats.

Donte' Stallworth, BAL

Bye: 8

Released by the Browns following the end of his league-mandated season-long suspension for being convicted of vehicular manslaughter, WR Donte Stallworth signed a one-year deal with the Ravens this offseason and intends on resurrecting his career. Stallworth's stats have been in a freefall since 2005, declining every season thereafter. But reports of his speed still being an asset and his experience a plus could put him in a position to help the Ravens' offense. We don't recommend drafting Stallworth, but considering him as a one-week replacement off waivers during the season might not be a bad idea. After all, he's got a lot to play for and prove.

The Seahawks drafted WR Golden Tate in the second round of the NFL Draft at No. 60 overall. Tate, who was a standout at Notre Dame, has the chance to start this season opposite T.J. Houshmandzadeh with Nate Burleson now in Detroit. Tate's main competition will likely come from Deion Branch and Deon Butler, but we expect Tate to win the job under the new coaching staff for the Seahawks. He should be considered a sleeper in seasonal leagues worth a late-round pick, and we like Tate as an early-round selection in rookie-only drafts.

Demaryius Thomas, DEN

Bye: 9

The Broncos drafted WR Demaryius Thomas at No. 22 overall from Georgia Tech as the first WR taken in the NFL Draft. Thomas is hoping to replace the recently departed Brandon Marshall. Thomas played in Georgia Tech's option offense -- a run-heavy game -- but still managed to catch 46 passes for 1,154 yards this past season, at 25.1 yards per catch. Thomas is trying to recover from a foot injury in February -- he had broken the fifth metatarsal in his foot. He spent March and much of April going through rehab and said he is "90 percent" healed. He has the potential to be a sleeper this year if healthy, and we like Thomas with a late-round pick in all leagues. He should go higher in rookie-only drafts and keeper formats, but the biggest thing to keep an eye on this offseason is his foot injury.

Devin Thomas, WAS

Bye: 9

Devin Thomas has the chance for a breakout season in his third year in the NFL, especially with the wholesale changes the Redskins made at head coach and quarterback. Thomas showed flashes in 2009 with 25 catches for 325 yards and three touchdowns, but the majority of that production came in Week 13 against New Orleans when he had seven catches for 100 yards and two scores. His training camp didn't start well and he was third on the team's WR depth chart in early August. Until he can improve his stock with the club, Fantasy owners should pass on him in drafts and look for him off waivers during the season.

Mike Thomas, JAC

Bye: 9

Mike Thomas hopes to build on a pretty good rookie campaign this season and possibly land a starting role. The 5-foot-8 speedster was pressed into action due to receiver injuries last year and pieced his way to 453 yards on 48 receptions with a touchdown. He also chipped in 86 yards rushing and returned kickoffs and punts. We expect Thomas to battle for playing time on offense, making him a candidate for as many as 50 catches. But with concerns about size and durability along with the Jaguars tepid passing offense putting doubt into his potential, he's no better than a middle- to low-end reserve worth a late-round pick in drafts.

Mike Wallace, PIT

Bye: 5

Fantasy owners are crossing their fingers that Steelers WR Mike Wallace doesn't suffer a sophomore slump in 2010. The Steelers are hoping the same thing after trading Santonio Holmes to the Jets in April. But Wallace also took a hit with Ben Roethlisberger being suspended for the first four games of the season. Wallace broke out last season with 39 catches for 756 yards (19.4 avg., which was best in the NFL) with six touchdowns and another 48 yards rushing. Wallace gave the Steelers' offense a deep-ball dimension in 2009, but he might have to cool his jets with Big Ben now suspended. Starting and playing more often might make him more consistent, but his receiving average should drop and the inconsistent QB play without Big Ben could hurt. Think of him as no better than a low-end No. 3 Fantasy WR who will likely go late in drafts. He has potential to be a star, but it won't likely happen until Roethlisberger returns following the suspension.

Kevin Walter, HOU

Bye: 7

Kevin Walter agreed to a new contract to return to the Texans this offseason. He disappointed Fantasy owners last season despite catching 53 passes as he only picked up 611 yards and two touchdowns. Early in the season he lost opportunities to TE Owen Daniels, but even when Daniels went down with a knee injury, Walter couldn't pick up his numbers. The good news is that Walter has at least 50 catches in his last three seasons, so counting on him being involved is safe. Treat him like a quality reserve WR in standard formats and a low-end No. 3 option in deeper leagues and PPR formats, making him very worthy of a late-round pick in drafts.

Hines Ward, PIT

Bye: 5

Hines Ward has gotten back to being a 1,000-yard receiver and is expected to at least come close to that mark for the third consecutive year in 2010. Last year he caught 95 balls for 1,167 yards and six touchdowns, and that's a pretty good expectation for him even without Santonio Holmes on his team anymore and with Ben Roethlisberger suspended for the first six games. He's had 1,000 yards in six of his last nine seasons with 975 yards in two of the three seasons he missed the mark. He also has had at least six touchdowns in seven of his last eight seasons. Ward isn't a reliable No. 1 Fantasy WR, but he's as reliable as you can ask for as a No. 2 choice – and best of all people pass on him because he's "old" (he'll be 34 years old at the start of the season). Ward could take a hit with Big Ben out for the start of the season, but he remains a worthy No. 2 Fantasy WR worth a mid-round pick.

Nate Washington is a candidate to break out further in 2010 after his first season with the Titans worked out fairly well for him. Washington posted career-bests with six touchdowns and 47 receptions, though he only racked up 569 yards in his first year coming to Tennessee from Pittsburgh. Washington should be good for those kinds of totals this season, making him a solid reserve Fantasy WR worth a late-round pick in drafts.

Like Peyton Manning is to Fantasy quarterbacks, Reggie Wayne is as safe as they come among Fantasy receivers. Wayne posted his sixth-straight 1,000-yard season in 2009 with 1,264 yards on 100 catches (12.6 avg.), and for the second time in three years reeled in 10 touchdowns. He added 16 receptions for 164 yards in three postseason games with another touchdown. Although he finished the year with a rough six-game skid that saw him own one game over 50 yards and two touchdown catches, and although the Colts have developed more receivers for Peyton Manning to spread the ball around to, Wayne is still expected to serve as a No. 1 Fantasy receiver in 2010. He's worthy of a pick starting at the beginning of Round 2, and you can count on another outstanding year for Wayne this season.

Wes Welker, NE

Bye: 5

Wes Welker has worked hard this offseason to come back from a terrible knee injury suffered in a meaningless game in Week 17 last year at Houston. With surgery in February, no one thought he'd have a chance to start the season on-time, but save for a few days on the preseason PUP list, he appears to be rehabbed and ready to play. Multiple accounts from Patriots practices said Welker was running without limitations and able to make cuts with some explosion. If you're hesitant to draft Welker because of the torn ACL he had, then you should probably look for another receiver. But with the rehab behind him and working in pads in full going on this preseason, Welker appears to be back at full strength. He is worth drafting as no worse than a low-end No. 2 Fantasy option in standard leagues with a pick as soon as Round 4 or 5, and he's worth a third-round selection in PPR leagues now that 100 catches doesn't seem out of the realm of possibility.

Roddy White, ATL

Bye: 8

Roddy White remains as the Falcons' top target and a No. 1 Fantasy WR. His yardage took a dip in 2009, but he made up for it with a career-high in touchdowns. He finished the year with 1,153 yards on 85 catches (a career-low 13.6 avg.) but the 11 scores he had helped his Fantasy owners even though he had just four 100-yard games. But he scored in all four of those games and only had seven games without 100 yards and/or a touchdown. Getting Matt Ryan back healthy for 2010 will help his cause, but the reality is that White is a safe candidate for good yardage and touchdowns over the course of the season. Continue to view him as a quality Fantasy WR worth a pick between Rounds 3 and 4 in drafts this summer.

Damian Williams, TEN

Bye: 9

The Titans used their second pick of the 2010 NFL Draft on Southern California WR Damian Williams, and judging by head coach Jeff Fisher's comments on Draft Day, they plan to use him immediately on special teams as a punt returner. Of course, that means he might contribute sparingly on offense. If your league counts special-teams yardage, he might be worth a look late in drafts. Otherwise he's a long-term project for the Titans; he'll be buried on the depth chart behind Kenny Britt, Nate Washington and Justin Gage. He's worth a late pick in dynasty/keeper leagues and a mid-round pick in rookie-only drafts.

Roy E. Williams, DAL

Bye: 4

We always talk about wide receivers entering their third season in the NFL and that's typically a breakout season. Well, this will be Roy E. Williams' third year with the Cowboys, and maybe he can finally have a breakthrough year. Williams has struggled since joining Dallas in a trade from Detroit early in 2008. He was expected to replace the departed Terrell Owens last year, but instead Miles Austin emerged as the No. 1 WR for Tony Romo. With Jason Witten also ahead of Williams, he was relegated to a complementary role, and that's not going to help Fantasy owners much. The Cowboys also sent a clear message to Williams with the addition of WR Dez Bryant in the first round of the NFL Draft. Bryant could compete with Williams for a starting spot. Williams still has potential to have a good year since he's starting in a pass-oriented offense and was once a quality target when he played with the Lions. But since joining the Cowboys he's been mediocre at best. We view Williams as a reserve Fantasy option worth a late-round pick as long as he keeps Bryant on the bench. He's not someone to consider as a starter, but he could be a bye-week replacement. And if Romo looks his way a little more this year then he might find his way into your lineup on a regular basis -- but that's a big if heading into the year.

Tight Ends

Martellus Bennett, DAL

Martellus Bennett is one of the better No. 2 tight ends in the NFL, but he has minimal Fantasy value as long as Jason Witten is healthy. In two seasons, Bennett has four touchdowns, but he only has 35 catches for 442 yards. Don't plan on drafting Bennett in the majority of leagues, but he would be worth adding off the waiver wire if Witten got hurt. Bennett has the potential to be a standout Fantasy TE, but not as long as he's playing behind Witten.

Kevin Boss has the potential to be a No. 1 Fantasy TE, but ankle issues and inconsistent play keep him pinned down. Boss underwent ankle surgery in late May, and the belief is that he'll be ready for the start of the season. That's a good thing, especially since he's in a contract year -- a good season statistically should pay off in a big contract. Boss finished 2009 with respectable totals of 42 catches for 567 yards and five touchdowns, but he only scored in four games and had three games with double digits in Fantasy points. The Giants have plenty of weapons in the passing game, so Boss will never post overwhelming stats. He should be viewed as a low-end No. 1 TE worth a late-round pick. Pairing him with another low-end No. 1 TE option on Draft Day is a good idea.

John Carlson is hoping to pick up this year where last season ended. Carlson was largely a disappointment in 2009, but he finished the season with a four-game touchdown streak. That made his overall stats look better -- 51 catches for 574 yards and seven touchdowns -- but he let Fantasy owners down early in the year with only three games over 50 yards receiving for the season. He has potential to be a No. 1 Fantasy TE even with Seattle adding rookie Anthony McCoy, but he's worth drafting as a No. 2 option with a late-round pick. And if he starts out the season like last year finished then he will be a No. 1 TE early in the year.

Brent Celek had a breakout season in 2009, and he will look to build on that this year. Celek had 76 catches for 971 yards and eight touchdowns and has established himself as a No. 1 Fantasy TE. His outlook is even rosier now that Kevin Kolb is the Eagles' starting passer; in two games last year with Kolb the tight end had consecutive eight-catch, 104-yard games with a score. We view him as a star in the making who should be considered a Top 5 player at his position -- plan on taking him with a pick somewhere in Round 5 or 6 once the "big three" tight ends are off the board.

Dallas Clark, IND

Bye: 7

Only three tight ends had over 1,000 yards last season, but only one of those three had 10-plus touchdowns. That would be Colts TE Dallas Clark, who is coming off his best season statistically in 2009 and should be an impact player again in 2010. Clark ended 2009 with 100 catches for a career-high 1,106 yards (11.1 avg.) and 10 touchdowns. He scored or had at least 80 receiving yards in 10 of his 16 games (excellent for a tight end) and latched on another 18 receptions for 180 yards and a touchdown in the playoffs. While he previously failed to top 1,000 yards in his last six seasons, many see his 2009 numbers as a sign of things to come, especially with so many other threats in the Colts' offense to draw attention away from him. True, those same threats might result in some rough weeks for the TE statistically, but even with the extra depth provided by other athletic players at the position, Clark is still tops. Consider him the best, most reliable Fantasy TE you can draft starting in Round 4 in all leagues this summer.

Chris Cooley is ready to return this season after playing in only seven games in 2009 due to a broken ankle he suffered during the midseason. But he could find himself losing playing time to Fred Davis, who became a star when Cooley was out last season. Ultimately we expect Cooley to resume his role as the No. 1 TE for the Redskins. Cooley said in an interview with CBSsports.com this offseason he is looking forward to playing for new coach Mike Shanahan and is healthy for 2010, and we're sure he's also excited about the addition of Donovan McNabb, who should target Cooley plenty this season. Plan on drafting Cooley with a mid-round pick after all the elite Fantasy tight ends are gone -- that's good value for a tight end with a pretty good track record. He will return as a No. 1 Fantasy option this season.

He was expected to help replace the departed Tony Gonzalez, but instead Cottam finished with just nine catches for 120 yards and no touchdowns in eight games. He was placed on injured reserve with a back injury, and he will look to rebound this year. But don't expect much from Cottam even though he will enter a potential contract year since he has competition from rookie Tony Moeaki. Bye: 7

Owen Daniels is looking to return after suffering a serious knee injury last year. Daniels was on pace for a colossal season in 2009 when he tore his right ACL in Week 8 and missed the rest of the season. His numbers at the time: 40 catches for 519 yards and five touchdowns, and you could merely double this to have an expectation for what he could have done with a full season. Even with contract issues surrounding the tight end (he's a potential free agent after 2010), the bigger issue is whether or not he'll be ready to go in training camp as he tore the knee ligament last November 1. Head coach Gary Kubiak said in late July that the team is aiming for Daniels to be ready for Week 1, but that could mean no preseason prep for him. This tempers his Fantasy value since there's a chance his season could start slowly and with light production. Consider him good enough to be a No. 1 Fantasy option worth a middle- to late-round pick, but until he is completely healthy you cannot draft him without getting another tight end later on as an insurance policy.

Fred Davis, WAS

Bye: 9

Fred Davis had a breakout season in 2009 when Chris Cooley (ankle) was injured, and Davis is hoping to build on that this year. The problem is Cooley is back at 100 percent this summer, which should push Davis' playing time in reverse. Still, he has potential to contribute and could be worth a late-round pick in deep Fantasy leagues. Davis had five touchdowns in a four-game stretch from Weeks 12-15 in 2009 when Cooley was out. For the season he finished with 48 catches for 509 yards and six touchdowns in 10 starts. Don't be surprised if new coach Mike Shanahan uses plenty of two tight-end sets to maximize the potential of both standout TE options, and having Donovan McNabb as his quarterback will help. That could increase Davis' value during the season.

Vernon Davis, SF

Bye: 9

Vernon Davis has gone from bust to elite, and now he has to prove he can stay there as one of the top Fantasy tight ends this season. After three disappointing seasons, Davis finally had a breakout year in 2009 with 78 catches for 965 yards (12.4 yards per catch) and 13 touchdowns, which tied the NFL record for touchdowns by a tight end. Davis said in an interview with CBSSports.com that he's confident 2010 will be just as good as 2009, and he's entering a potential contract year. "I knew I always had the talent, I just didn't have the right things around me," Davis said. "I can't do everything by myself. It takes everybody." Davis said Alex Smith getting his job back as the starting QB has improved his outlook (his stats say the exact same thing), and he's ready for a repeat performance. We like Davis as a solid No. 1 Fantasy option, and he's worth drafting somewhere around Round 5. He should be ready to live up to the lofty expectations after finally playing like a star player – you can expect his name to fly off the board on Draft Day once Dallas Clark is taken.

Ed Dickson, BAL

Bye: 8

To make sure veteran TE Todd Heap doesn't get overworked again in 2010, the Ravens used a third-round choice on Ed Dickson of Oregon in the 2010 draft. Dickson is considered a "hybrid" tight end with good athleticism and receiving skills but bad blocking skills. Dickson has upside but won't play a ton unless something happens to Heap. He's not worth a pick in seasonal drafts but is worth the late-round pick in dynasty/keeper leagues and an early-to-middle round choice in rookie-only drafts.

Anthony Fasano, MIA

Bye: 5

Was Dolphins tight end Anthony Fasano a one-year wonder? That might be the case after a disappointing 2009 season. Fasano had 34 catches for 454 yards and seven touchdowns in 2008 and looked like he was headed toward becoming a solid Fantasy option. Instead, Fasano regressed in 2009 and finished with 31 catches for 339 yards and two touchdowns. With the addition of Brandon Marshall to the Dolphins' offense, chances are Fasano won't be a useful Fantasy option again. He's not worth drafting as anything more than a No. 2 option, but he could also land on rosters as a one-week replacement during the season.

Jermichael Finley, GB

Bye: 10

Packers second-year TE Jermichael Finley delivered on his modest expectations in 2009, catching 55 passes for 676 yards (12.3 avg.) and five touchdowns. But it took a while – he only had 17 catches in his first seven games before suffering a knee sprain that sidelined him for three games. He came back from the injury like gangbusters, piling up 38 receptions in seven weeks including four weeks with at least five receptions. There's no doubt that Finley will be a key part of the Packers offense, and there's no doubt that the Fantasy world will consider him a big sleeper for 2010. Consider Finley a low-end No. 1 Fantasy TE with potential to blossom into a solid no-brainer starter by the end of the season. Best of all, he'll be available for the taking with a middle- to late-round pick in drafts.

Antonio Gates, SD

Bye: 10

Antonio Gates continues to be one of the best tight ends in the NFL and an elite Fantasy option, and he could be motivated this season since he's entering a potential contract year. Gates has at least eight touchdowns in six years in a row. He also had his first 1,000-yard season since 2005 last year with 79 catches for 1,157 yards. We like Gates as a Top 3 Fantasy TE, and he's worth drafting as early as Round 4 in all leagues. He'll be 30 this year, but the Pro Bowl TE shows no signs of slowing down. Gates said in an interview with CBSSports.com that he still considers himself the best TE in the NFL. "It's a situation that once you set a standard you have to constantly keep going and constantly do things where you can challenge yourself," he said. "Every year is a challenge. It's a challenge I have. You always set goals for yourself. I'm never complacent. I'm always striving to become better. That's just my motive."

Tony Gonzalez, ATL

Bye: 8

Tony Gonzalez slightly underwhelmed in his first season with the Falcons when he posted his lowest yardage output since 2002, but his sights are set on doing better in 2010. The 867 yards he gained on 83 catches (a career-low 10.4 avg.) with six touchdowns was enough to make him a Top 5 Fantasy TE in 2009, but not by much. Gonzalez told CBSSports.com that 2010 could "potentially" be his final year and that he doesn't care about stats, just making the playoffs. There's no doubt that the Falcons will continue to use him in their offense, including in the red zone (five of six TDs came from 20 yards or closer), but with their run game and other receiver options just as appealing, Gonzalez's numbers could be limited to what they were last year. Consider him a No. 1 Fantasy TE worth a pick between Rounds 5 and 7 in drafts – if someone in your league jumps on him sooner it might be because they value his name more than his 2010 outlook.

Jimmy Graham, NO

Bye: 10

The New Orleans Saints took Miami (FL) TE Jimmy Graham with a third-round pick in the NFL draft. The 6-foot-6, 260-pound Graham is a converted college basketball player who gives New Orleans needed depth behind Jeremy Shockey and David Thomas. Graham will be buried on the depth chart, so he's unlikely to help Fantasy owners much this season. If that changes, then Graham will warrant consideration, but until then you can keep him off of seasonal-league rosters. We do recommend a late-round pick on Graham in dynasty/keeper drafts and a Top-30 pick in rookie-only formats.

Jermaine Gresham, CIN

Bye: 6

A tight end in the mold of Antonio Gates, Jermaine Gresham is expected to start right away for the Bengals after being their top pick in April's draft. Gresham is an accomplished pass catcher as well as a solid blocker, totaling 66 passes for 950 yards and 14 touchdowns at Oklahoma in 2008 (he missed 2009 with a knee injury). We expect some growing pains in 2010, especially since the Bengals have other good receiving options for Carson Palmer to target. Gresham isn't worth a pick in seasonal drafts but is worth a late-round choice in dynasty/keeper leagues and is a late first-round pick in rookie-only drafts.

Rob Gronkowski, NE

Bye: 5

The Patriots drafted TE Rob Gronkowski in the second round of the NFL Draft at No. 42 overall out of Arizona. He fills a huge need and could be expected to contribute from Day 1. After sitting out 2009 with a back injury, Gronkowski left college early as one of the top tight end prospects. The Patriots added another tight end in Round 4 with Aaron Hernandez out of Florida. Hernandez and Gronkowski will likely compete for the starting spot, but Gronkowski has more value coming into the season. He's worth a late-round pick in seasonal leagues, and he should be drafted with a mid-round selection in rookie-only drafts and keeper formats.

Bye: 8

For the second year in a row, Ravens TE Todd Heap played in 16 games in 2009. He also posted his best stats since 2006, catching 53 passes for 593 yards and six touchdowns. Heap's numbers were strong early in the season, and there was a significant correlation between Heap's big games and QB Joe Flacco's big games. There was a chance that Heap could build on this season and be even more productive in 2010, but the Ravens improved their receiving corps this offseason via free agency and the draft, likely taking targets away from the tight end (two tight ends were drafted). Additionally, health concerns are still valid. Consider Heap a low-end No. 2 Fantasy TE only worth a late-round pick in the deepest of drafts. You're better off passing on him on Draft Day and claiming him off waivers for short-time use during the season.

Dustin Keller, NYJ

Bye: 7

Dustin Keller needs to carry over his playoff production from 2009 into this season in order to live up to Fantasy expectations – and he just might do it. Keller helped the Jets reach the AFC Championship Game last season with 12 catches for 181 yards and three touchdowns in three playoff games. His postseason production was what most Fantasy owners were hoping for during the regular season. In 2009, Keller's second year, he had 45 catches for 522 yards (11.6 yards per catch) and two touchdowns with one fumble lost. But if he can use the playoffs as a springboard for this season, along with getting another offseason of work in with QB Mark Sanchez, Keller can develop into a No. 1 Fantasy TE. Further helping his cause is the Jets' addition of field-stretching receiver Antonio Holmes, who will take targets away from Keller but also make his coverage easier on him. Keller should be drafted as a low-end starting option or even as a backup depending on the size of your league with a late-round pick, but Keller has immense potential. Don't be surprised if he starts for your Fantasy team early in the year if he can build off last year's playoff success.

Mercedes Lewis, JAC

Bye: 9

The Jaguars are expected to have Mercedes Lewis as their starting tight end again this season, and motivation will be high for him to play well because he'll be in a contract year. Of course, Lewis had his best year yardage-wise last year with 518 on 32 catches (16.2 avg.) and a pair of touchdowns. He was a solid one-week replacement option in 2009 and should serve in the same role for Fantasy owners in 2010, although he will receive plenty of competition from Zach Miller. He's only draft-worthy in the deepest of leagues as a No. 2 TE. Keep him on waivers otherwise and grab him if you need him.

Randy McMichael, SD

Bye: 10

Randy McMichael signed with the Chargers in June, and he will compete for playing time behind starter Antonio Gates. The good thing for McMichael is he's reunited with Norv Turner, who was his offensive coordinator in Miami earlier in his career. The bad thing is Gates, when healthy, is clearly the best TE option in San Diego. That means McMichael shouldn't be drafted in the majority of leagues this season.

Heath Miller, PIT

Bye: 5

Fantasy owners are hoping that Steelers TE Heath Miller continues to break out in 2010. His fifth NFL season was his best as he caught 76 balls for 789 yards (10.4 avg.) last year -- career-high numbers. He added six touchdowns and was a solid No. 1 option for owners. There are numerous receivers on the Steelers' roster that will get targeted each week, but following the departure of Santonio Holmes in a mid-April trade, there should still be opportunities for Miller to post receptions and quality stats. The problem for Miller was Ben Roethlisberger being suspended for six games for violating the NFL's personal conduct policy. That could severely hamper Miller's production, and we view him as a No. 2 Fantasy option to enter the season.

Zach Miller, OAK

Bye: 10

Zach Miller might be the best offensive player for the Raiders. He led the Raiders in receiving in 2009 with 66 catches for 805 yards and three touchdowns. In three seasons, Miller has 166 catches for 2,027 yards and seven touchdowns. His stats would likely be much better if he played for a different team, but Miller should improve this season with the addition of QB Jason Campbell, who had a great rapport with Chris Cooley and Fred Davis in Washington. Miller also benefits this season as he's entering a potential contract year. Miller has the ability to be a No. 1 Fantasy option with the Raiders, but he should be drafted as a No. 2 TE and viewed as a sleeper. He is worth a late-round pick in all leagues.

The Chiefs drafted TE Tony Moeaki in the third round of the NFL Draft at No. 93 overall out of Iowa. Moeaki is more of a blocker than receiver since he had a career-high 30 catches and four touchdowns last year. Moeaki isn't going to make Chiefs fans and Fantasy owners forget about Tony Gonzalez, who was traded to Atlanta last season. Moeaki has minimal Fantasy value in seasonal leagues and is only worth a late-round pick in keeper formats and rookie-only drafts.

Nelson had 18 catches for 157 yards (8.7 yards per catch) and one touchdown last year. He was expected to battle for the starting TE job in Buffalo, but a four-game suspension has put those plans on hold. Bye: 8

Perhaps no player better enjoyed the arrival of Jay Cutler in Chicago than TE Greg Olsen, who posted career-highs across the board with 60 catches for 612 yards and a whopping team-high eight touchdowns (all scored in six games over the course of the season). His poor yardage total did not keep him from being a Top-10 Fantasy TE in 2009, but the addition of Mike Martz as offensive coordinator will make an impact. Sure, Martz will help the passing game in Chicago, but also keep in mind that Martz has never had much success with tight ends in his career. The subsequent addition of blocking tight end Brandon Manumaleuna can't be considered a good sign either. He's no better than a low-end No. 1/top-end No. 2 Fantasy TE worth a late-round pick, and he shouldn't be the lone tight end on a Fantasy roster. This could be a lost season for the former Miami Hurricane.

Bye: 7

Rookie TE Brandon Pettigrew was beginning to step up and play to the potential we saw in him when he tore his ACL on Thanksgiving, ending his season. He has since rehabbed and is ready to participate in 2010 -- he was on the Lions' PUP list for just a couple of days this summer. A huge, versatile tight end with big hands, Pettigrew ended 2009 with 30 catches for 346 yards (11.5 avg.) and two touchdowns. The Lions' addition of TE Tony Scheffler speaks volumes for what Pettigrew's playing time will look like this season, but there's no denying his potential. With Scheffler coming aboard, Pettigrew shouldn't be considered outside of deeper dynasty/keeper league drafts.

Considered the most athletic of the Panthers' tight ends, Dante Rosario led the players at his position with 26 catches for 313 yards (12.0 avg.) in 2009 with two touchdowns. Can he duplicate that in 2010? In three years, Rosario has five touchdowns and 630 yards on 50 catches, with his receiving numbers increasing annually. He's headed for a contract year in 2010, which should motivate him to play well in order to land a rich deal. Consider Rosario a deep, deep sleeper for 2010 -- some roster moves by the Panthers might help (or hurt) his production.

Bo Scaife, TEN

Bye: 9

Bo Scaife is expected to return to the Titans this season after receiving the franchise tag during the offseason. Scaife has routinely caught between 45 and 60 passes over his last three seasons but sports a poor receiving average (9.6 per catch over his career) and scored only four times in that span. Though his stats perked up a bit once Vince Young started for the Titans last season, Scaife is best suited to be a one-week replacement option off waivers when faced with a favorable matchup during the season. Keep him out of your plans on Draft Day.

Tony Scheffler will play for the Lions following a pre-draft trade in April. He's expected to serve as a short-area target for Matthew Stafford as well as take pressure off of second-year TE Brandon Pettigrew, who is recovering from knee ligament surgery. Scheffler might put up some good stats at the beginning of the season but ultimately his fate is tied to the recovery of Pettigrew. If Pettigrew is a training camp participant with no rust, Scheffler's presence would probably limit both of their stats. But if Pettigrew is sidelined, the door is open for Scheffler to get some decent totals. Bottom line: Scheffler is no better than a low-end No. 2 Fantasy TE worth a look late in deeper drafts.

Visanthe Shiancoe, MIN

Touchdowns helped propel Vikings TE Visanthe Shiancoe into Fantasy prominence in 2009, and it should happen again with tight end-loving quarterback Brett Favre back under center in 2010. Shiancoe scored 11 times on 56 catches (essentially a touchdown every five receptions) and had 566 yards to boot. Shiancoe might have been a potential bust if Favre had retired, but with the veteran signal-caller coming back for his 20th season, Shiancoe should do well in the red zone again. Eleven touchdowns is a bit much to expect, but he should still be good enough to use as a solid No. 1 Fantasy option, especially with the Vikings down a target following Sidney Rice's late August hip surgery. Consider the burly Vikings tight end with a pick between Rounds 8 and 10 depending on the size of the league.

Jeremy Shockey's stats continued to not match the perception that he's an elite Fantasy TE. Playing in 13 regular-season games in 2009, Shockey caught 48 passes for 569 yards (11.9 avg.) and three touchdowns. He also chipped in two touchdowns in three postseason games with 58 receiving yards on seven grabs. Shockey should continue to be the primary tight end for the Saints in 2010, making him worth a late-round pick in deeper leagues as a No. 2 Fantasy option. A late-May seizure at the Saints' practice facility appeared to be a one-time incident and not something owners should be concerned about.

Saints TE David Thomas, acquired just before the start of the 2009 regular season from New England, paid small dividends for the team last year. Most weeks he didn't put up much in the way of stats, but from Week 10 through Week 16 when Jeremy Shockey was dealing with injuries, Thomas put up some nice totals and ended the year with 356 yards on 35 catches and a touchdown. Since he's staying with the Saints after signing his restricted free agent tender offer, expect him to back up Shockey again in 2010. For now, he's not worth owning in Fantasy.

Benjamin Watson, CLE

Benjamin Watson caught on with the Browns this offseason, and it's expected that he'll start and see a lot of playing time with them in 2010. Watson finished last year with 29 catches for 404 yards (13.9 yards per catch) and five touchdowns, and these are the kind of stats he's posted throughout his six years in New England. He has a shot to do a little better than that in Cleveland since he'll see more playing time and might be relied upon a little more in the Browns' passing game. He's still safe to treat as a middle- to low-end No. 2 TE worth a late pick in deeper drafts. In standard formats he should be passed on and considered off waivers during the year.

Kellen Winslow, TB

Kellen Winslow should continue to be one of the best receiving options on the Buccaneers this season -- so long as his knee lets him. After leading the team in receptions (77), receiving yards (884) and receiving touchdowns (five) in 2009, Winslow had offseason arthroscopic surgery on his troublesome right knee. He missed some offseason work but should be fine for the start of the year. The TE is easily the biggest playmaker at the disposal of young QB Josh Freeman and should continue to be a huge part of the Bucs' offense that lacks experienced receivers. He ranks as a second-tier TE, but is still plenty strong as a No. 1 option. Just don't reach for him because he's a familiar name -- think about getting him with a middle- to late-round pick.

Jason Witten, DAL

Jason Witten continues to be one of the top Fantasy options at his position. Despite struggling for most of 2009, Witten still finished with tremendous stats. He only scored two touchdowns, which was a source of frustration for him and Fantasy owners, but he still had 94 catches for 1,030 yards, which were the second-best totals of his career. "I thought I had a good year," Witten said in an interview with CBSsports.com. "I didn't get in the end zone as much as I liked. You want to be that guy that makes those critical plays." Witten has never been amazing in terms of finding the end zone -- he averages less than four a year in seven seasons -- but he still produces at a high level based on his yards and catches. Consider Witten a No. 1 Fantasy TE again this year, and he's worth drafting as a Top 5 player at his position. He should be selected beginning in Round 5 or 6 on Draft Day.

Kickers

David Akers, PHI

David Akers continues to be one of the best kickers for Fantasy owners. He had more than 30 field goals for the second year in a row and 45 extra points in back-to-back seasons. The Eagles offense will continue to give Akers plenty of chances to score points, even with Donovan McNabb gone, and thus he should be considered a No. 1 Fantasy option even at 35. Plan on drafting Akers with a late-round pick, and he should be one of the first kickers to come off the board.

Bye: 4

The Bucs signed Connor Barth to be their placekicker beginning in Week 9 in 2009, and he finished the season in that role. The former Chiefs kicker remained suspect, hitting 14 of 19 field goals, though he only missed one from over 50 yards (3 of 4) and two between 40 and 49 yards (5 of 7). Barth will likely compete for the kicking job with the Bucs in training camp, and it's worth noting that a strong season will land him a pay day as he's in a contract year. But Barth must first prove that he's a reliable kicker, and then the Bucs' offense must improve to the point where they can move the chains and get Barth in a position to kick field goals. Once both of those things happen, he'll be worth considering in Fantasy on a regular basis. Otherwise, he's a one-week replacement off waivers during the season when the matchup is right.

Rob Bironas, TEN

Bye: 9

Rob Bironas continues to serve as a quality Fantasy kicker worthy of a pick on Draft Day. Last season he hit 27 of 32 field goals and all 37 of his extra point attempts, but he averaged 4.67 points per week during the team's 0-6 start and 9.0 points per week once Vince Young got under center and the offense shined thanks to Chris Johnson. Expect Bironas to average close to 9.0 points per week for much of the 2010 campaign, or as long as the Titans' offense remains efficient. He's one of the few kickers who is worth considering before the final round of a Fantasy draft.

Josh Brown, STL

Bye: 9

Josh Brown has the potential to be a good kicker. In three of the past four seasons, Brown has made at least 25 field goals. He also has a strong leg with six made field goals of at least 50 yards last year. But because Brown plays for the Rams, who have plenty of offensive deficiencies, his Fantasy value is limited. Brown could be a good one-week replacement since he kicks indoors and the Rams offense, when they do move the ball, tends to stall inside the red zone. But don't draft Brown in the majority of leagues since there are more consistent kickers in the NFL.

Matt Bryant, ATL

Bye: 8

The Falcons will utilize Matt Bryant as their kicker in 2010 after he found his way on to their roster last season. In five games Bryant made 7 of 10 field goals and all 10 of his extra point attempts. While it was discouraging to see Bryant miss three of four kicks from 40-plus yards (he hit a 51-yard attempt), it's encouraging that he'll likely see plenty of opportunities to kick in 2010. Consider Bryant a sleeper worth picking in the last round of your Fantasy draft if you need a kicker with some upside. It only helps that he's in a contract year, so a good season could mean a nice pay day for Bryant.

David Buehler, DAL

Bye: 4

David Buehler is expected to compete for the kicking job in Dallas this season. Though he has yet to kick a field goal in the NFL as he was a kickoff specialist last season, neither has his competition, Conner Hughes. Buehler appears to have the edge based on how he's been doing in camp, so tab him as the expected winner of this camp battle. Remember that the starting kicker for the Cowboys could be worth a last-round draft pick because the Cowboys have an explosive offense and play in a great stadium, which is a bonus for a Fantasy kicker. Worst case scenario: You cut him for another kicker if he stumbles early in the season.

Dan Carpenter, MIA

Bye: 5

Dan Carpenter played well enough in 2009 to earn a spot in the Pro Bowl after Nate Kaeding took himself off the roster. Carpenter made 25 of 28 field goals and 37 of 38 extra points. He only had one field goal of at least 50 yards (52), but he had five games with double figures in points. Carpenter has attempted at least 25 field goals in two consecutive seasons and will enter this season as a low-end No. 1 option for Fantasy owners, especially since expectations for the Miami offense went up following the acquisition of Brandon Marshall. The Dolphins will give him plenty of chances for scoring opportunities, thus making him worth a final-round pick in all leagues.

Mason Crosby, GB

Bye: 10

Packers PK Mason Crosby missed nine field goals in 2009 (four from 50-plus yards) but continued to attempt so many field goals that it didn't hurt him that much. In fact, despite missing nine kicks he still finished as a Top 5 Fantasy kicker in standard-scoring leagues. Making 48 of 49 extra points certainly helped his cause. Crosby should be primed for a huge season: Not only is the Packers offense expected to be even better in 2010 but the kicker will be in a contract year, so a strong season will result in a big pay day. Crosby remains a No. 1 Fantasy kicker worth a pick between the final two rounds of standard drafts this summer.

Billy Cundiff, BAL

Bye: 8

Billy Cundiff replaced Steven Hauschka as the Ravens kicker early in the 2009 season and managed decent totals, but now he's competing for his job after the Ravens signed Shayne Graham in June. Keep an eye on what happens with Cundiff, but Graham is expected to win the job. Cundiff likely will have minimal Fantasy value this year and should not be drafted in any leagues unless he surprises us and beats out Graham.

Phil Dawson, CLE

Bye: 8

Kicking for the Browns resulted in just 19 field-goal attempts for Phil Dawson last season, but he hopes to have more this season so long as the contract he plays for is sufficient. Dawson held out of offseason workouts with the team because of his unhappiness with his contract; the team signed Shaun Suisham to fill in for him. Playing in just 11 games in 2009, Dawson made 17 of 19 field goals and 18 of 19 extra points for Cleveland. He's a potential free agent after this season, so kicking well could lead to cashing big checks next offseason (though he's trying to do that this season), but the Browns offense isn't expected to be explosive enough for him to see a glut of opportunities. Keep him limited to being a one-week replacement option off waivers during the season.

Jay Feely, NYJ

Bye: 7

Jay Feely signed with the Cardinals this offseason after the Jets replaced him with Nick Folk in February. That's a fairly good spot for him since he'll kick for an offense that plays its home games indoors and is now good but not great following the retirement of Kurt Warner and the trade of Anquan Boldin. In 2009, Feely was 30 of 36 on field goals with a long of 55, his lone kick from 50-plus yards. He also made all 32 extra point attempts. Consider him a low-end starter in deeper leagues and a guy to eyeball off waivers in case your initial kicker opens the season on the wrong foot.

Nick Folk, NYJ

Bye: 7

The Jets signed Nick Folk this offseason, and all signs point to him being the team's placekicker in 2010 following Jay Feely's signing with the Cardinals. Folk was among the better Fantasy kickers coming into 2009 when he played in Dallas, but he struggled following hip surgery and was released by the Cowboys in December. Folk made just 18 of 28 field goals last year with 36 extra points with the Cowboys before getting released. On his career he's made 64 of 81 field goals (79 percent) with all 131 extra-point attempts successful. Folk has the chance to return as a No. 1 kicker based on his strong leg, and Feely had over 30 attempts last year with the Jets. Folk might not be worth drafting as a No. 1 option, but he could be a steal off the waiver wire and someone to consider during bye weeks if he goes undrafted.

Graham Gano, WAS

Bye: 9

Graham Gano is hoping to stick with the Redskins this season after finishing the year in Washington. He kicked in the final four games for the Redskins and made all four of his field goal attempts with six extra points. He will compete with Justin Medlock for the No. 1 job, but even if Gano is the starting kicker he has minimal Fantasy value and would only be worth using as a one-week replacement. Ignore him in all leagues on Draft Day.

Stephen Gostkowski, NE

Bye: 5

Stephen Gostkowski had another outstanding season for the Patriots in 2009 and will enter this season as a No. 1 Fantasy kicker. Gostkowski made 26 of 31 field goals with two kicks of 50 or more yards. He also added 47 extra points. It's the second year in a row he's made at least 25 field goals, and he should continue to produce at a high level. The Patriots have a high-powered offense, and Gostkowski should get plenty of chances to score his fair share of points. He's worth drafting in all leagues in the final two rounds as a Top 5 player at his position.

Robbie Gould, CHI

Bye: 8

Bears kicker Robbie Gould continued to be a reliable Fantasy kicker in 2009, nailing 24 of 28 field goals with two blocked and hitting all 33 of his extra point attempts. Gould even made his first two career field goals from over 50 yards. While he didn't finish among the Top 12 kickers in 2010, he will be a useful late-round pick in deeper leagues this summer and could see more opportunities to hit field goals if the Bears offense continues to grow.

Shayne Graham signed with the Ravens in June after the Bengals let him go following the 2009 season. The Ravens offense is on the rise, and Graham could be a sleeper in all leagues. Plan on drafting Graham with a late-round pick, but make sure he beats out Billy Cundiff, as expected, in training camp.

Jason Hanson, DET

Bye: 7

Lions kicker Jason Hanson began to show an aging leg in 2009 when he missed seven field goals, including one from 30 to 39 yards, three from 40 to 49 yards and three more from 50-plus yards. The last time the long-time Lions kicker missed seven field goals in a season was 2001 when he missed nine. Typically Hanson kicks with better accuracy than this but his decline in production is cause for concern, as is a minor knee procedure done in early August. Combine all of that with the limited opportunities he's had over the course of the last two seasons (50 total field goal tries) and Hanson doesn't exactly register as a reliable Fantasy kicker. True, the Lions' offense figures to be improved this season, but Hanson is still no better than a one-week replacement off waivers during the season. Don't draft him this summer.

Garrett Hartley, NO

Garrett Hartley enters 2010 as the Saints kicker after a tumultuous 2009 season. He missed 11 games, including four because of a suspension for violating the NFL's substance-abuse policy, but he finished the year kicking for the Saints and even booted the field goal that pushed them to Super Bowl XLIV. He made 9 of 11 field goals during the season along with 10 of 11 extra points and hit all five field-goal attempts during the postseason. So long as he doesn't miss any playing time, he should be one of the best Fantasy kickers available to owners this season because he's a part of a very potent offense. Consider him with a late-round pick.

Sebastian Janikowski, OAK

The Raiders still have faith in Sebastian Janikowski after signing him to a four-year, $16 million contract this offseason. It's too bad Fantasy owners don't trust Janikowski the same way -- but maybe you should. Janikowski is coming off the best season of his 10-year career, making 26 of 29 field goals with his only misses coming from 45, 57 and 66 yards. He made six kicks of at least 50 yards, including a 61-yarder that was the fourth longest in NFL history. The problem is the Raiders offense, which doesn't post enough firepower to make Janikowski a consistent option. Still, if the Raiders can improve, then Janikowski could see his value rise. He enters the seasons as a No. 2 Fantasy kicker on Draft Day, but don't be surprised if he ends up as a No. 1 option before the end of the year. He's great to check back for off waivers when you need a kicker during the season.

Nate Kaeding, SD

Nate Kaeding will enter this season trying to prove he can overcome his playoff failures from 2009. Last year, Kaeding was a star in the regular season as he made 32 of 35 field goals with a long of 55 (one of three field goals from 50-plus yards) and 50 of 51 extra points. But in the Chargers lone playoff game against the Jets he missed three field goals and looked lost. He even looked that way during Pro Bowl week, which he bowed out of. Kaeding should rebound to play at a high level again, but keep an eye on his offseason and preseason games. As long as he's mentally OK and not dealing with any problems he should be considered a No. 1 Fantasy option again. The Chargers have a high-powered offense, and Kaeding is worth drafting with a late-round pick in all leagues.

John Kasay, CAR

Panthers kicker John Kasay finished 2009 with 31 of 32 extra points made and 22 of 27 field goals made. He continued to be excellent from inside of 50 yards (21 of 23 made) but struggled from 50-plus yards (1 of 4). Still, he's nailed over 80 percent of his attempts for four straight seasons and is at the very least a reliable one-week replacement Fantasy kicker. If the Panthers were to improve their offense, he'd be considered a Top 12 option heading into the season. He's not worth drafting in most leagues.

Rian Lindell, BUF

Rian Lindell isn't going to overwhelm you with production since he plays for a bad offense with the Bills in a terrible stadium in Buffalo with bad weather. But Lindell made 28 of 33 field goals last season with 24 extra points with a long field goal of 56 yards. He's now made 58 field goals in the past two seasons and has potential to be a No. 1 Fantasy option if Buffalo can improve its offense under new coach Chan Gailey. Don't plan on drafting Lindell in any Fantasy leagues, but he could be worth adding off the waiver wire if the Bills offense improves or even as a bye-week replacement.

Ryan Longwell, MIN

Vikings kicker Ryan Longwell certainly enjoyed the improved offense in Minnesota, and he did a lot to help it along. Longwell nailed 26 of 28 field goals and a whopping 55 extra points in 2009. He has missed 15 kicks in four seasons in Minnesota. Longwell will get another shot to kick for the Vikings in 2010, and he'll be motivated to do as well since he'll be in a contract year. Consider him a safe Fantasy placekicker to begin the season, making him worth a pick in the final two rounds of your draft this summer.

Olindo Mare, SEA

The Seahawks used their franchise tag on Olindo Mare, and they are expecting another good year out of him. In 2009 Mare had the finest season of his career despite Seattle's struggles. He made 24 of 26 kicks, ranking third in the NFL in percentage, and is now 48 for 53 in his two seasons with the Seahawks. Mare finished the season making a franchise record 21 straight attempts and added 22 touchbacks on kickoffs, fifth in the league. Despite those stats, Mare is still just a No. 2 Fantasy kicker. The Seahawks have plenty of problems on offense, and Mare doesn't get the guaranteed chances like most elite kickers with a better team. Mare is more suitable as a one-week replacement, and he's not worth drafting in the majority of leagues.

Joe Nedney has the potential to be a solid Fantasy kicker this season with the 49ers improving their offense, but Nedney has to prove it first. He struggled in 2009 with only 17 field goals, and this was after making at least 26 field goals in three of the past four seasons. Nedney should not be considered a No. 1 Fantasy kicker, but he is worth using as a one-week replacement. And if he starts off the season playing well then he's worth adding off the waiver wire in all leagues.

Bye: 9

Matt Prater is a restricted free agent this offseason. He is expected to stay with the Broncos and is coming off a solid year in 2009. Prater made 30 of 35 field goals with a long of 51. He also connected on all 32 extra points. Prater made seven field goals in a row to end the season and 18 of his last 19. One concern: With Brandon Marshall gone from Denver, the Broncos' offense might not be as prolific as it was in 2009. Kicking in the thin air of Denver is appealing, so play it safe and consider him a very low-end No. 1 Fantasy option. Plan on drafting Prater with a late-round pick in all leagues.

Bye: 7

Neil Rackers will compete for the kicking job with the Texans this season with incumbent Kris Brown. He's no longer with the Cardinals, where he struggled in 2009 hitting only 16 field goals on 17 attempts and a long of 48. He also made 37 of 38 extra points. It was the first time since 2003 that he didn't make a field goal of at least 50 yards. In 2005, Rackers was the best Fantasy kicker, but his production has steadily declined each year. Your best bet is to wait on a winner in the kicking derby between Rackers and Brown, then swipe him either with a late pick in late-summer drafts or off waivers before the regular season kicks off.

Jeff Reed and the Steelers are expected to be a match once again in 2010 after the team franchised him this offseason. Reed hit 27 of 31 field goals and 41 extra points in 2009, making for one of his best seasons. It was helped along by the Steelers' potent offense, which gave Reed a number of opportunities to kick. More of the same is expected in 2010, which makes Reed worthy of a late-round pick in drafts this summer.

Jaguars kicker Josh Scobee will try to rebound after a rough 2009 season in which he missed 10 of 28 field-goal attempts. To be fair, five of his 10 misses came from 50-plus yards (4 of 9 from that range), though he did miss four kicks from 40 to 49 yards. Because his kicking percentage hasn't been huge since 2007 and because the Jaguars' offense doesn't give him a ton of chances to nail three pointers, he's nothing more than a one-week replacement option worth considering when your primary kicker is on bye. Don't include Scobee in your Draft Day plans.

Ryan Succop, KC

Bye: 4

Ryan Succop has the chance to be a sleeper kicker this season with the Chiefs offense expected to improve. Succop played well in his first year with Kansas City in 2009, nailing 25 of 29 field goals with a long of 53 and all 29 extra points. He should be able to improve on those stats this year as the Chiefs' offense tries to take the next step with offensive coordinator Charlie Weis on staff. If you miss on all the elite kickers on Draft Day then take a flier on Succop. Otherwise look for him to be a quality one-week replacement during the season, especially if Kansas City's offense improves.

Lawrence Tynes, NYG

Bye: 8

Lawrence Tynes matched his career high for field goals made in 2009 with 27, and he also had one of his best years with 45 extra points. He will look to build on that this season and remain more consistent. Tynes started off the season on fire last year with three of his first five games with double figures in Fantasy points. But he only had one game with double figures in Fantasy points the rest of the season and let plenty of owners down. Look for Tynes to play like a low-end No. 1 Fantasy option, and he's worth a last-round pick in all leagues. The Giants have a potent offense, and Tynes is a reliable option as a starter or, at worst, as a one-week replacement.

Adam Vinatieri, IND

Bye: 7

Injuries limited Colts kicker Adam Vinatieri in 2009, but it's the team's hopes that he's available in 2010. He finished last season with 7 of 9 field goals made (none from 50-plus yards) with 17 of 18 extra points hit. Vinatieri is well-known thanks to his Super Bowl exploits, but it's been a while since he's been a reliable Fantasy kicker. Plus, the Colts' offense doesn't give him as many field goal opportunities as you might think. Consider him a good enough starter in deeper leagues, but otherwise consider other kickers before going with Vinatieri.

Defense/Special Teams

Bears

Bye: 8

The Bears DST was not a reliable unit in 2009, but you can throw out the numbers they put up there following a busy offseason. The defense should take quite a step forward in 2010 after adding defensive end Julius Peppers in March and re-acquiring safety Chris Harris in April. Signed to a six-year deal, Peppers is expected to immediately make an impact for the Bears' pass rush and help the secondary pick off passes (that's where Harris comes in) thanks to his pressuring of the quarterback. Peppers meant everything to the Panthers defense and should mean the same to the Bears. The Bears also invested draft picks in potential-laden players Major Wright, a safety, and Corey Wootton, a defensive end with huge upside. But it's all about Peppers -- his presence along with the return of Brian Urlacher should make the Bears DST a low-end No. 1 Fantasy unit. Consider them with a late-round pick in drafts.

Bengals

Bye: 6

The Bengals DST was a welcomed surprise in 2009, and they will look to build on that this year. They totaled 34 sacks, 19 interceptions, 10 forced fumbles (six recovered) and scored four touchdowns (three defensive) while holding opponents to an impressive 291 points on the year. The Bengals have a terrific cornerback duo in Leon Hall and Johnathan Joseph and also were able to cultivate a pass rush without DE Antwan Odom (he had eight sacks in six games before tearing his Achilles' tendon). The DST isn't exactly a popular option coming into this season, so keep them limited to a No. 2 option. You're probably better off grabbing them off waivers during the season if they play well.

Bills

Bye: 6

The Bills DST has potential this season under new defensive coordinator George Edwards changing the scheme to a 3-4 look. Buffalo has talent on defense in Paul Posluszny, Leodis McKelvin and Jairus Byrd, and they've added more talent with LB Andra Davis and DE Dwan Edwards along with rookies Torell Troup and Alex Carrington in the draft. The Bills showed their talent in 2009 with 10 games with double digits in Fantasy points. Buffalo, behind nine from Byrd, had an astounding 28 interceptions last year with two defensive touchdowns, 34 sacks, five fumble recoveries and 13 forced fumbles. But the key for the Bills is how quickly they adapt to playing in the 3-4 scheme -- they were a 4-3 scheme last season and are switching over this season. If they can build a roster with good 3-4 personnel, then they might be worth a look as a sleeper option. But if they can't pull off what the Packers did in 2009, then they'll get roasted. Leave them out of draft plans at this point but keep an eye on them this summer in case they take some steps forward.

Broncos

Bye: 9

The Broncos defense should have a similar look this season even with LB coach Don Martindale replacing Mike Nolan, but they'll be without pass-rush extraordinaire Elvis Dumervil for most of the season. Dumervil, the key to their front seven and their sack totals, tore his pectoral muscle in August and has been ruled out for four months; the team might put him on season-ending injured reserve. The Broncos have some good inside linebackers and a very good secondary, but they'll struggle for sacks and have a hard time pressuring opposing quarterbacks. Adding a new defensive playcaller to the mix won't make things any easier. We do not recommend drafting the Broncos DST in standard or even deeper formats. They should serve as good one-week options during the season.

Browns

Bye: 8

When you consider DSTs, you typically consider them for their defenses and not their special teams. But thanks to kick returner Josh Cribbs, the Browns are an appealing unit for their special teams, not their defense. Cribbs returned a punt and three kickoffs for touchdowns in 2009, more than anyone else in the league, and with him signed to a new deal he's expected to keep doing it for the Browns. But their defense has a lot of work to do to match up to Cribbs' contributions as they had just 10 interceptions, 11 forced fumbles (nine recovered) and no touchdowns. They did contribute 40 sacks, which is pretty incredible considering the rest of their stats, but they also allowed 379 points and 6,227 total yards. Obviously the winds of change are blowing through Cleveland and their defense is attempting to rebuild -- they've already traded pass rusher Kamerion Wimbley (26.5 career sacks) and acquired CB Sheldon Brown and LB Chris Gocong. For now, consider the Browns as a one-week replacement option off waivers when the matchup is right, though if kick- and punt-return yardage count big in your league then certainly the Browns are worth a late draft pick.

Buccaneers

Bye: 4

The Buccaneers DST didn't have big expectations coming into 2009, and they don't have big expectations for 2010, either. In total last season, the unit was good for 19 interceptions, 28 sacks, 10 forced fumbles (all recovered), with three special teams touchdowns, two defensive touchdowns and an alarming 400 points against. While the interceptions and touchdowns were good, the rest of the numbers were not up to snuff. The Bucs improved their run defense this offseason with the drafting of DTs Gerald McCoy and Brian Price, but they otherwise stood pat. Consider them a one-week replacement off waivers when faced with a good matchup during the season.

Cardinals

Bye: 6

The Cardinals defense lost two of its stars this offseason when LB Karlos Dansby (Dolphins) and DB Antrel Rolle (Giants) signed with new teams. That will hurt the Cardinals DST, which was solid for Fantasy owners in 2009. The Cardinals still have talented playmakers in Darnell Dockett, Adrian Wilson, Dominique Rodgers-Cromartie and Calais Campbell, and Kerry Rhodes should make an impact after coming over from the Jets. The Cardinals also added a solid run-stuffer in the draft with DT Dan Williams from Tennessee and a good LB to replace Dansby in Daryl Washington from TCU. But the Cardinals DST should be considered a No. 2 Fantasy option entering the season. If they start out playing well then add them off the waiver wire, but they are best suited as a bye-week replacement when the season starts.

Chargers

The Chargers DST will have a different look in 2010 with Antonio Cromartie and Jamal Williams no longer with the team, but there is still talent in San Diego's defense. Shawne Merriman will return, and he will get help from Eric Weddle, Stephen Cooper, Shaun Phillips and Quentin Jammer. The Chargers also spent three draft picks on defense in LB Donald Butler, S Darrell Stuckey and DT Cam Thomas. On special teams, Darren Sproles may not necessarily be the return man anymore with an increased role on offense, but we still think the Chargers will find a way to make plays as a DST unit. They should be considered a low-end No. 1 option worth a late-round pick. In 2009, the Chargers DST had five touchdowns, 15 interceptions, one safety, 35 sacks, 18 forced fumbles and 11 fumble recoveries. They had nine games with double figures in Fantasy points and are capable of duplicating those stats this year.

Chiefs

The Chiefs defense has a lot of work to do to improve this season, which is why new defensive coordinator Romeo Crennel was hired. Kansas City will remain a 3-4 scheme, but they will need to add some more playmakers. Last year, the Chiefs DST had five touchdowns, 15 interceptions, one safety, 23 sacks, 13 fumble recoveries and 12 forced fumbles. Jamaal Charles led the way on special teams with 36 returns for 925 yards and a touchdown, but the Chiefs DST isn't going to fool anyone as a starting Fantasy option. They do have potential, especially if Crennel can make a drastic improvement in the offseason, but don't worry about them on Draft Day. Instead, keep an eye on how the Chiefs do early in the season and then consider adding them off the waiver wire as a one-week replacement.

Colts

The Colts DST did not finish as a top unit in 2009, and they're still not quite a top unit to consider for 2010. But they did very well in April's draft, adding key front-seven players like DE Jerry Hughes and LB Pat Angerer. They'll provide depth, if not play in limited roles, this season. Last year the Colts totaled 34 sacks, 16 interceptions, 15 forced fumbles (nine recovered) and three touchdowns (one on a kickoff return). With their special teams expected to remain an unimpressive threat and the defense owning a quality pass rush but not a consistent run-stuffing crew, the Colts are best considered a No. 2 DST not worth drafting. Look for them off waivers when you need a one-week replacement during the season.

Cowboys

The Cowboys DST is underrated when it comes to Fantasy owners, but they should be considered a No. 1 option. In 2009, the Dallas defense didn't allow a 100-yard rusher all season long and finished strong with 42 sacks, 11 interceptions, three defensive touchdowns, 13 fumble recoveries and 18 forced fumbles. The Cowboys DST had 10 weeks with double digits in Fantasy points, and they also have a strong return game with Felix Jones and Patrick Crayton. Consider the Cowboys DST with a late-round pick, and they have a chance to start for you all season long based on their quality production.

Dolphins

The Dolphins DST will have a new look this season. Mike Nolan comes over from Denver as the new defensive coordinator, replacing the fired Paul Pasqualoni, and the team has parted ways with Joey Porter and Jason Taylor. Jason Ferguson returns, and the Dolphins added Karlos Dansby as a free agent from Arizona and DL Jared Odrick, LB Koa Misi, LB A.J. Edds, CB Nolan Carroll and safety Reshad Jones in the NFL Draft. Miami was terrible on defense last season with 43 sacks, 850 tackles, six fumble recoveries, 14 forced fumbles, 15 interceptions and four defensive touchdowns. They allowed 390 points and were not productive on special teams outside of a few big plays from Ted Ginn Jr. Nolan should turn around the defense, and young cornerbacks Vontae Davis and Sean Smith should continue to improve. The addition of Nolan is key, and he could turn around the Dolphins DST in a hurry. Consider them a sleeper coming into the season and a low-end starting option in deeper leagues.

Eagles

The Eagles DST continues to be a dynamic unit thanks to their aggressive play-calling and the return abilities of DeSean Jackson. The Eagles DST had 11 games with double digits in Fantasy points in 2009 with six touchdowns, 25 interceptions, two safeties, 46 sacks, 14 fumble recoveries and 16 forced fumbles. Though they traded away quality role players in CB Sheldon Brown and LB Chris Gocong this offseason, they added DE Darryl Tapp and LB Ernie Sims and drafted for defense with DE Brandon Graham, S Nate Allen, DE Daniel Te'o-Nesheim, CB Trevard Lindley and LB Kennan Clayton with their first five picks. We like the Eagles DST as a No. 1 Fantasy option, and they are worth a late-round pick in all leagues.

Falcons

The Falcons DST is a No. 2 option heading into 2010 after underwhelming in 2009. The unit picked up 28 sacks, 15 interceptions, 20 forced fumbles with 13 recovered and three defensive touchdowns -- but there's hope for the upcoming season. The Falcons were pretty good against the run but were bombarded through the air, which is why they signed CB Dunta Robinson in March. Then they bolstered their run defense in the draft with the additions of OLB Sean Weatherspoon and DT Corey Peters. If they can add or develop a pass rusher to go with their improved defense and find a speedy return man then the Falcons could be a sleeper. But until they do, keep them off of Fantasy rosters outside of being a one-week replacement option off waivers during the season.

49ers

Bye: 9

The 49ers DST benefits from several things, mainly some talented players (Patrick Willis, Dashon Goldson, Justin Smith, Nate Clements, Takeo Spikes and Aubrayo Franklin), a defensive-minded head coach in Mike Singletary and playing in a weak division. That should allow the 49ers DST to be considered a middle- to low-end No. 1 Fantasy option worth drafting with a late-round pick. With two games each against the Rams and Seahawks, and now the Cardinals without Kurt Warner and Anquan Boldin, the 49ers should play well defensively. In 2009, the 49ers DST reached double digits in Fantasy points 10 times -- with six against their division foes. In those six games, the 49ers had three with 20 or more Fantasy points, including a whopping 43 in Week 4 against the Rams. The 49ers should continue to improve this season, especially with the addition of rookie safety Taylor Mays and return man Ted Ginn Jr., and they are worth drafting in all leagues.

Giants

Bye: 8

Perry Fewell will be the Giants new defensive coordinator this season, and he should do well to revive a unit that was decimated by injuries in 2009. The biggest key is trying to replace the departed Antonio Pierce, but the Giants still have plenty of talent on defense with Justin Tuck, Osi Umenyiora, Mathias Kiwanuka, Aaron Ross and the addition of safety Antrel Rolle in free agency and rookie DE Jason Pierre-Paul in the draft. Look for the Giants to rack up a healthy amount of sacks, and the return of Umenyiora, Ross and Kenny Phillips from injury-plagued years in 2009 should boost their pass defense. The Giants DST is a low-end No. 1 option worth a late-round pick in all leagues.

Jaguars

Bye: 9

For lack of a better term, the Jaguars DST was a mess in 2009, and a major philosophical change is in store for this season. After deciding to play in a 3-4 scheme last season, the team totaled a league-worst 14 sacks with 15 interception, 15 forced fumbles (10 recovered) and no defensive touchdowns while teams put up 380 points and 5,633 total yards on them. The Jaguars are moving back to a 4-3 scheme and potentially have a good pass-rush tandem in third-year DE Derrick Harvey and newly signed pass rusher Aaron Kampman. They also added DT Tyson Alualu in the draft, and he is expected to provide a push up the middle. But secondary questions remain, and playing in a division with the Colts, Texans and Titans is never an easy thing. That said, keep the Jaguars DST off of Fantasy rosters unless you're looking for a one-week fill-in during the season.

Jets

Bye: 7

It's amazing how much impact a coach can make sometimes, and that's what happened with the Jets defense thanks to head coach Rex Ryan. He brought his aggressive style of defense to New York, and the Jets defense turned into the No. 1 unit in Fantasy Football. In 2009, the Jets DST had four touchdowns, 20 interceptions, 39 sacks, 21 forced fumbles and 16 fumble recoveries. They are tremendous at stopping the run and also have the best cover man in the NFL with Darrelle Revis. The Jets DST should be close to repeating as the No. 1 unit this season and be worth a pick starting in Round 9. They have plenty of talent with Revis, David Harris, Shaun Ellis, Bart Scott and Calvin Pace and added another CB in the draft with Kyle Wilson in the first round as well as LB Jason Taylor as a free agent. And with Ryan at the helm, the defense should remain aggressive, which is great for Fantasy owners.

Lions

Bye: 7

Even with defensive-minded head coach Jim Schwartz at the helm, the Lions defense and special teams couldn't get much going in 2009. The Lions finished the season with nine interceptions, two safeties, 26 sacks, 18 forced fumbles (13 recovered) and three total touchdowns (two by rookie DB Louis Delmas). The Lions have made an effort to bulk up their defensive line, not only acquiring veteran pass rusher Kyle Vanden Bosch (who excelled under Schwartz in Tennessee) but also defensive tackle Corey Williams. The biggest addition might be from the draft with No. 2 overall selection Ndamukong Suh, who could be a force right away at defensive tackle. More help on special teams could make the DST an interesting option this season. But until the Lions make those strides, no one will even think about drafting the unit for Fantasy play. Expect to consider them as a one-week replacement option off waivers this season.

The Packers DST was a sleeper unit heading into 2009, and they came through big time. Though they started slowly, the unit racked up an NFL-best 30 interceptions, 37 sacks, 11 forced fumbles (10 recovered) and four defensive touchdowns. It's scary to think about how much better this unit could be with more sacks and fumble opportunities, which should come as the team grooms LB Clay Matthews into a pass rusher and potentially adds another rusher to replace Aaron Kampman. So long as Dom Capers is at the control of this unit, consider the Packers DST a high-quality No. 1 option worth a late-round pick. They might be tops in the league in 2010.

Panthers

Bye: 6

The Panthers DST finished 2009 as a Top-10 Fantasy choice thanks in part to pass rusher Julius Peppers. As a unit they totaled 22 interceptions, 31 sacks, a pair of safeties, 22 forced fumbles (15 recovered) with just 308 points against. And as a unit they had just one touchdown -- an interception return by Peppers. But the franchise lost Peppers to the Bears via free agency and doesn't have a solid pass rusher to lean on like they had before. Despite several moves they made to build the depth of their defense, we're not big fans of the Panthers DST until they can develop Everette Brown into a playmaker to replace Peppers and probably add another talent or two. Consider them a one-week replacement option when the matchup is right during the season.

Patriots

The Patriots defense continues to go through a makeover after losing Mike Vabel, Rodney Harrison, Richard Seymour, Tedy Bruschi, Asante Samuel and Junior Seau in the past two years. Vince Wilfork returns this season, but the Patriots lost Adalius Thomas when he was released. It's a good thing New England addressed defense in the draft. New England drafted CB Devin McCourty in Round 1, DE Jermaine Cunningham in Round 2, LB Brandon Spikes in Round 2, DT Brandon Deaderick in Round 7 and DT Kade Weston in Round 7. The Patriots have emerging talent in Jerod Mayo and Brandon Meriweather and managed modest stats in 2009 with three defensive touchdowns, 18 interceptions, 31 sacks, 11 fumble recoveries and 20 forced fumbles. The Patriots also didn't have any special teams touchdowns with Laurence Maroney leading the way on kickoff returns (13 for 279 yards) and Wes Welker on punt returns (27 for 338 yards). Don't overvalue the Patriots DST on Draft Day, but they are worth taking if you miss out on all the elite options.

Raiders

The Raiders defense needs a lot of work before Fantasy owners can count on them as a potential starting unit or even as a bye-week replacement. In 2009, the Raiders only had double figures in Fantasy points four times, but two of those came against Kansas City. Oakland finished the season with no defensive touchdowns, just eight interceptions, 37 sacks, 13 forced fumbles and 12 fumble recoveries. They did improve in the offseason with the addition of LB Rolando McClain during the draft and Kamerion Wimbley via trade, and those guys should help the likes of Nnamdi Asomugha. But the Raiders DST is still a No. 2 Fantasy option and only worth using as a one-week replacement during the season. They should not be drafted in the majority of leagues.

Rams

Steve Spagnuolo was one of the best defensive coordinators when he was with the Giants, so hopefully he can influence the Rams in his second year as the head coach. But he needs talent, which he's lacking coming into this year. Aside from James Laurinaitis, Oshiomogho Atogwe and Chris Long, the Rams need work on defense. They passed on help at the top of the draft when they took Sam Bradford over Ndamukong Suh, and time will tell if that works out for them. Last season they totaled just 25 sacks, eight interceptions, and one touchdown while allowing 436 points and 5,965 yards. The Rams added some help on special teams by drafting return man Mardy Gilyard from Cincinnati, and hopefully he can inject some life into the special teams. The Rams DST might be useful as a one-week replacement if they improve during the season, but don't plan on drafting them.

Ravens

The Ravens defense might have lost coordinator Rex Ryan to the Jets but still finished 2009 as a Top-10 unit. They totaled 32 sacks, 22 interceptions, 15 forced fumbles (10 recovered) and scored four touchdowns (three defensive) while holding opponents to a combined 261 points on the year. Unlike previous off-seasons, most the key guys in the defensive unit (Terrell Suggs, Ray Lewis, Haloti Ngata and Fabian Washington) are expected to return, and they added top talent in pass rusher Sergio Kindle and massive DT Terrence Cody in the draft. The only question mark is Ed Reed, who had serious hip and shoulder surgery this offseason and might not be ready for Week 1. Still, the Ravens have the talent and scheme to remain a No. 1 Fantasy DST worth a late-round pick this summer.

Redskins

The Redskins DST could be considered a sleeper this season. They bolstered their defensive front by signing nose tackle Maake Kemoeatu and DL Adam Carriker, and they should help new defensive coordinator Jim Haslett as the unit shifts from a 4-3 to a 3-4 scheme. That could be a tough defensive line to crack with Kemoeatu and Albert Haynesworth up front, and the Redskins could improve their pass rush with second-year LB Brian Orakpo's improvement and the potential for a strong year from Andre Carter making the switch from DE. Washington also has a premier LB in London Fletcher and playmakers in the secondary with LaRon Landry and DeAngelo Hall. Consider the Redskins DST a No. 2 option on Draft Day, but they are a solid one-week replacement during the season and could be worth taking a flier on if you miss out on some of the elite DST units.

Saints

The Saints DST was a pleasant surprise in 2009 and should continue to be a force in 2010. Totaling 26 interceptions, 36 sacks, 15 forced fumbles (13 recovered) with nine touchdowns allowed (eight defensive – three by Darren Sharper -- and one on special teams), the Saints enjoyed playing strong against the run with the likes of Sedrick Ellis and Remi Ayodele up front and a solid crew of cornerbacks and safeties helping against the pass. Staying healthy also played a key role. They've added defensive end Alex Brown, who was cut loose by the Bears, to their pass rushing corps and should help make their defense strong again this season. They also added CB Patrick Robinson in the first round to bolster the secondary and re-signed safety Darren Sharper. Consider the Saints DST a No. 1 Fantasy DST worth a pick in the final two rounds of drafts this summer.

Seahawks

The Seahawks DST has a long way to go before Fantasy owners can count on them this season. There is some talent there with David Hawthorne, Jordan Babineaux, Aaron Curry and newly-drafted safety Earl Thomas, but losing Darryl Tapp (trade to Philadelphia) and Patrick Kerney (retirement) will hurt the pass rush. In 2009, Seattle had three defensive touchdowns, 13 interceptions, 28 sacks, 10 fumble recoveries and 13 forced fumbles. Aside from the interceptions, these were the worst stats for the Seahawks DST in the past four seasons. Don't worry about the Seahawks DST on Draft Day, but if they do improve early in the year then they could be a useful one-week replacement.

Steelers

Bye: 5

By name, the Steelers defense is considered one of the best and as such will be off the board earlier than most DSTs in 2010. But in reality, the unit lagged in 2009 as they finished as a fair-to-modest unit with 46 sacks, 12 interceptions, 14 forced fumbles with 10 recovered and only three touchdowns. Injuries played a part as dynamic players such as Aaron Smith and Troy Polamalu missed a lot of playing time. While they'll be back this year, and while the Steelers addressed their special-teams play with the additions of Antwaan Randle El and Arnaz Battle, they're not worthy of being the top DST picked this summer. Consider them a No. 1 option, but don't be the owner to reach for them between Rounds 8 through 11. After that, they're fair game.

Texans

Bye: 7

After being considered doormats of the league for years, the Texans DST finally took some steps forward in 2009 and is considered a sleeper unit in 2010. The DST ranked in the middle of the pack and finished the year with 28 sacks, 14 interceptions, a pair of safeties, 12 forced fumbles and three touchdowns (two defensive). The addition of LB Brian Cushing helped slow down opposing running backs, and the defensive line is slowly improving. Houston lost CB Dunta Robinson via free agency but replaced him with rookie Kareem Jackson with a first-round pick. They also have plenty of talent with Mario Williams and DeMeco Ryans. The Texans DST has the potential to be a starting unit this year and is worth a late-round pick in all leagues.

Titans

Bye: 9

The Titans defense didn't quite meet expectations last season, but there's hope for 2010. It'll take some work as they saw potential starter Gerald McRath lose four games with a suspension, and they've lost veteran CB Rod Hood for the season with a torn ACL. But their biggest problem from last season might have been solved: Developing a pass rush. The Titans moved to fix that by adding rookie DE Derrick Morgan from Georgia Tech with their first pick in Round 1. They also addressed other parts of the defense by signing free agents DE Jason Babin, LB Will Witherspoon and CB Tye Hill. Tennessee has already lost DE Kyle Vanden Bosch to the Lions via free agency, and Jevon Kearse, who has run out of gas, is also off the team. Keith Bulluck is a free agent and is also recovering from a torn ACL suffered last season and LB David Thornton is also banged up. Consider them more of a No. 2 option you can pass on in drafts -- at least until they field a capable starting defense.

Vikings

Bye: 4

There were high expectations for the Vikings DST in 2009, and they met most of them. Finishing as a Top-10 unit, the Vikings totaled 47 sacks, 11 interceptions, 23 forced fumbles (13 recovered) and three touchdowns (one defensive, two on returns thanks to Percy Harvin). There is early talk that Vikings DT Pat Williams is considering retirement, which would hurt the unit's run defense and pass rush (Williams helps set up pass rusher Jared Allen), and DE Ray Edwards is also a candidate to leave this offseason via free agency. Cornerback Cedric Griffin will also be missed for a chunk of the 2010 season after tearing his ACL in the NFC title game, but other than that the unit should return intact, including coordinator Leslie Frazier calling the plays. Thus, the Vikings DST is still a top Fantasy option worth a late-round pick in drafts this summer.
